Poetry.

Nearing the Shore.

An old man sits in a worn arm-chair,
White as snow is his thin, soft hair,
Furrowed his cheek by time and care,
And back and forth it sways;
There's a far away look in his dim, dim eye,
Which tells of thoughts of the long gone-by,
For he sits once more 'neath a cloudless sky,
And in childhood merrily plays.

He rests his cheek on the head of his cane,
And happily smiling, dreams over again
Of that home, the brook, the meadow, the lane,
Dreams all with a vision clear;
Then childhood yields unto manhood's place,
And he looks once more in his bright, bright face,
And down in the starry eyes he can trace
A love remembered and dear.

Then he wakes and sighs: "It seems but a dream,
That comes to me now like a golden gleam,
Or the shimmering glow of the sun's last beam,
But 'tis pleasant to think it o'er,
That youth was so sweet, but now it is past,
Those days of love were too precious to last,
But over yonder their pleasures are cast,
And I am nearing that shore."

Evil, Its Origin, etc.

A. A.

Webster to the contrary notwithstanding, I maintain that evil is not "the cause of sin and suffering." Evil is sin and suffering. Suffering is physical evil, evil of condition or circumstances. Sin is moral evil, wickedness, wrong, and pertains to a mind or character. I know no evil that may not be classed in one or other of these classes. Moral evil can only pertain to moral beings, that is, beings possessed of mind.

To say that "evil is the cause of sin," seems absurd, and false. Physical evil, suffering, is occasioned by sin, and must find its origin subsequent to the sin which occasioned it. The cause of suffering is in the laws of the ruler of the universe; physical evil is penal—that is, punishment; or corrective—that is chastisement. Thus the Lord "forms peace and creates evil," —the evil opposed to peace—war, etc.; and thus the Lord does "evil in a city," punishing its inhabitants; and thus we "receive evil," as well as good, "at the hand of the Lord." Who will claim that God creates moral evil, sin, wickedness, vice? Surely no one.

But there is a great deal of mist raised by different classes about what they term "the principle of evil." Some talk of "sin in the flesh," "inbred sin;" I suppose it is just "the principle of evil." Others think there is no Satan, but only this "principle," and some think that God could not create Satan a devil, but must create him holy, having first created this "principle of evil" to tempt him!

What is "the principle of evil"? Is it a material element, (or call it spiritual if you will,) like electricity, or oxygen? How could that present thought to mind, or exercise any mental influence or be morally evil? Well, if it is not an element, is it a rule of action—an evil rule of action which God made? Perhaps you say it is "an influence." What is an influence? Do you mean power exerted by an intelligent personality? If not, you require to learn that mind cannot be influenced by anything else than thought presented to it; no force, material, spiritual, or satanic, can move it morally. The reader must be conscious that thoughts are sometimes presented to his mind, against his will, when no visible cause for their occurrence exists. Can a mere "principle," of good or evil, account for this? Certainly not: it requires an intelligent personality.

A "principle," be it in the world at large, or in a person's flesh, or in the heavens ages ago, could not possess moral character, so as to be morally evil, unless it possessed mind and will, and then it would be a person. A principle of moral evil is an absurdity.

The fact that some angels sinned only proves that a possibility of sinning existed.

Who created evil—moral evil? Who to-day creates moral evil? THE SINNER. And this alone can constitute a sinner: not being a passive agent or instrument moved by external forces, but being the free, voluntary, self-determining author of what is evil. Responsible beings—angels or men—must be the creators of that character for which they are held responsible.

Can moral evil come to an end? Some claim that it cannot. They think that a sin, once launched, goes forever careering onward in the universe of God, and never blotted out of existence; hence, the sinner must forever suffer, and forever launch more sins. This is Materialism—the Materialism of sin. But when we know that evil is not substance, or essence, or principle, but the action of a moral agent in the wrong direction, we can understand that the action ceases with the actor, and the influence comes to an end with the being who wielded it.

When Christ destroys the works of the devil no "evil principle" of his Father's creating will be left to be "the cause of sin and suffering."

"Second Death,"—Its Power.

SAMUEL TARVER.

Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power. (Revelation.)

May we not infer from the text that, in point of time, there will be two resurrections?

The "beheaded for the witness of Jesus," (Rev. 20:4,) constitutes the first resurrection, and occurs a "thousand years" and a "little season" before the battle of Gog and Magog. (Rev. 20:8.)

The next resurrection, it appears, will be composed of a class termed "rest of the dead," (Rev. 20:5,) and also those that are alive, (what?) yes, of those "that are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord. (1 Thess. 4:5.) In what manner we conceive the living righteous affected by "second death," will be seen by the following. If they that are alive and remain unto the "coming," are not subject in some measure to the power of second death, in what sense are the beheaded or first resurrection "blessed" in being exempt from said power?

In considering this subject, it is first necessary to define "second death." The expression is only found in Revelation. Its original signifies complete dissolution. It is entirely associated with events connected with the dissolution of the present earth in anticipation of the "new"; and therefore synonchronises with 2 Pet. 3; 1 Thes. 5, and other Scriptures which announce that momentous occurrence. We therefore cannot conceive this "second death" to signify the death of, or dying of a resurrected sinner; nor a repeated or a double death of any one given individual. Its true import is certainly included in the following history and prophecy: "The world that then was being overflowed with water perished, [first destruction—first death,] but now reserved unto fire against the day of judgment," [second destruction—second death.] "The heavens being on fire shall be destroyed," "the earth also and the works therein shall be burned up." Why this general dissolution or judgment analysis will not affect or have power over the beheaded or first resurrection is simply because God's original sentence of death upon man, had already been satisfied in them. "It is appointed unto all men once to die,"—they died.

Those living at the coming of Christ not having satisfied the death sentence in the ordinary ways of demise, must, to say the least, be "changed," (perhaps by material agencies,) though it be done in "the twinkling of an eye." This statement is entirely parallel with the Scriptural fact, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom."

Furthermore, how can immortality be reached from the mortal stand-point except by regeneration or second birth? and how, can the second Adamic or spirit birth be accomplished without the complete displacement or dissolution of the first Adamic or water birth?

"There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body." "It is sown [begotten according to flesh] a natural body, it is raised [begotten according to the spirit] a spiritual body." "If [therefore] that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die," how can even the living righteous at Christ's coming be quickened except they die? "Blessed [at that time] is he that hath part in the first resurrection, on such the second death hath no power."

"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter the kingdom." First, "born of water," which element is the six sevenths of the natural man: perhaps all of him under perfect analysis. Next, "born of the Spirit." Whence came he by natural or water birth, from a state of consciousness or from that of oblivion? It is sufficient to say that prior to birth, we know nothing except from tradition. By keeping up the analogy between the "visible and invisible," we may conceive how it is that in sheol whither the natural man goeth by appointment, there is no knowledge or device. Death reduces man to this condition of oblivion, and it is sheol or the grave, whence God proposes to accomplish the Spirit birth. Immortality! not by a line of natural causes, but by thy promise and thy power alone, O God.

"Unto dust shalt thou return." Will there be any exception? Among the children of men was there ever any exception? Enoch walked with God and was not. Did Enoch die? If it be appointed unto men once to die, then Enoch died. The "was not" in the narrative supposes that he died: that like even as Christ he entered the sheol, hades, hell, or oblivion state. But it is said Enoch did not see death: how could he see death, or how will any one whom God shall choose to "change" in the twinkling of an eye?" However instantaneous, it is nevertheless a change,—doubtless a dissolution, though accomplished as it were in the whirlwind of Elijah.

Songs.

Songs are a delight, whether heard in warblers or in the joyful tones of men. Early and savage tribes gave vent to happy emotions and deep pleasure in singing, laughter, and wild cries of delight, continually softened and refined, until we have the choice melody of present songs.

Songs are as natural as groans and tears, and, unless perverted, as sinless as godly sorrow. Their music is as deeply implanted in us as in the sons of God. Then it is most befitting for saints to sing; and from ancient times they have well used their privileges, and it has ever been a blessing to them, and through its melting and heavenly influence, to millions of hearts besides. Our hearts are filled with holy thoughts when we read the inspired strains of a David or an Isaiah, and the chord has increased as the church traveled through the wilderness and dark mountain passes, or through fair lands, with glory-beaming skies, until the world has acknowledged the power of sanctifying song, whether coming from the Prince of Singers, or from two men in a Phillippian jail. But, of all times, redeeming song should now roll with deepest sweetness and with clearest intonations of coming glory.

Lift up your heads and rejoice, and let thy rejoicings fountain forth, in loud hallelujahs, for "thy King is coming soon." Oh! ye professed saints of the mighty God, are your hearts pure? Is the Comforter walking in every avenue? Are they burning with earnest hope? Prepare to meet thy God. Prepare to join that rapturous song: Lo! this is our God, we have waited for you; we are glad, and rejoice in the salvation that thou, dear Lord, dost bring.

But the peculiar joy to us is in contemplating our future songs. Listen to the victorious song of the sleepers; the triumphal song of the transformed witnesses; the mighty one celebrating the earth work of the Lamb, and our exaltation; the song of welcome by Jehovah's choir, the coronation song, and songs of praise forevermore,

Who will sing on that beautiful shore,
The melodious songs of the blest.

Ladies' Hair Dressing.

C. C. M.

Of course it is none of my business how the ladies dress their hair and I do not purpose to meddle with that which does not belong to my legitimate sphere. But I was so impressed with the following facts that I am constrained to give them for the benefit of all "whom it may concern":

The present fashion of arranging ladies' hair with the profusion of coils, puffs, and frizzes is exceedingly detrimental to the natural growth of that "crowning glory." The head is overheated with false hair, and the weight of the coiffure, which comes upon one spot on the crown of the head, drags the hair out, and causes the round bald spot so frequently seen when ladies are en deshabille.

The large number of hairpins necessary to fasten the ornamental hair in a manner to give it a natural effect is also injurious to the scalp, breaking off the hair where they are pushed in, and getting so tangled in its meshes that, when withdrawn, each one will have a snarl attached.

In the fashionable mode of hair dressing, the natural growth is an insignificant part, sometimes more in the way than otherwise, for all the show it makes in the great pyramid that is heaped up in such luxuriance; it is, therefore, neglected and left in a most careless condition. None would ever suppose that long hairs were the growth of years, observing how, in many instances, they are tangled and ruthlessly pulled out. Unless women have a large coil of natural hair, they ignore it entirely, and strive to hide what little they possess by rolling it in a small knot on the back of their heads to be covered up by the false switches.

The state of the majority of ladies' hair at the present time is truly lamentable. The front locks are broken and burned off with hot irons. The bald spot on top is fast widening its circle; the scalpy head, which is "never seen," is left undisturbed from shampooning, and the hair, which should be silky from brushing, and free from snarls, receives no attention save the rough handling necessary to tuck it out of sight.

"Wicked Men Shall Wax Worse and Worse."

A. NEWTON.

It is but a few days since we were upon the lawn, playing with our associates in the merry morning of bright and happy childhood, when the sweet notes of the spring birds made our hearts thrill with their pleasing song, and our groves were the scenes of some of the happiest days of childhood and innocent youth. It was then, as we can distinctly recollect, that the church seemed to possess the same purity and simplicity of the child around the family-hearth or the home tree.

Once, men loved Christianity more than they did the honors of men and the applause of the idolatrous throng around them. Once, men would sacrifice for the Redeemer—time, money, and a good worldly name for any assurance of a home in the everlasting Kingdom.

Men are so wedded to the world, or a chosen creed, that we can only now and then find one who can read the Scriptures, unbiased by the taint of some religious dogma. I am glad that there is an Infinite Judge, who will administer at his tribunal to all men according as their works shall be.

Before the church became so degenerate as it is, its adherents sought to know the will of God, by a faithful study of his law; and this, we believe, to have been one source of its harmony and success. When the adherents of the Christian church began to turn to fables, or the doctrines of men, just there and then they laid the foundation of the Apostate Gentile Church which, to-day, is more corrupt than was the Jewish church at the birth of Christ, or the crucifixion of the Messiah.

Many years ago, I heard an uneducated Christian speaking in prayer meeting, where many highly cultivated persons attended. He alluded to his small capacity, but said he:

"My little gill-cup is full."

I had not thought of this for ye till a short time since I was thinking of being "filled with all the fullness of God," and this expression recurred to me, and it seemed an apt illustration of how we, according to our capacity, can be filled from the great fountain of all good.

"Of his fullness have ye all received."

"We must be empty vessels," said Dorothea Trudel, "that God may fill us with himself."—Christian at Work.

Webster as a Theologian.

O. D. GIBSON.

In giving the definition of words so long as Webster follows giving the simple meanings in the English language, so long he goes well, but when he allows theology to swerve, then he strikes wild,—for instance, take the word Soul, instead of giving us first its simple English meaning as a word, he plunges right into theology, and as he had a theory of his own, he gives it a meaning necessary to his theory, which, if applied to the word, as found in Scripture texts, would make sad havoc of the Bible. Also, if the same course were pursued with other words it would play havoc with them. Let us see, he says, "Soul, That intelligent, and spiritual, and immortal part of man." Now f[illegible]ngs must necessarily follow:

[illegible]hen we find this word it refers to man, and only to one part of [illegible], hence cannot be used with reference to any other being.

2. Wherever the word occurs it is necessarily something "spiritual and immortal." Now, if these adjectives belong to this noun, then wherever we find the word soul, these specific qualities must neccessarily be attached. To illustrate let us apply this mode of defining to some other word. Suppose we take the word Hat. I say it is the woolen article worn on the head. Every one can see that my qualifying term "woolen" makes the word hat specific, thus excluding all other fabrics, so that leather, silk, or cotton, made in the same shape, and worn on the head, yet are not hat, for hat is a "woolen" article. Here every one can see the injustice I have done by giving to hat a specific quality, which does not belong to it. So with the word Soul, the qualifying terms "spiritual and immortal" no business there, and nothing but theory put them there.

Now let us look awhile at the injustice it does the Scriptures. Notice first Webster's definitions of Immortal. "That which is not susceptible of dying." Death, "Cessation or extinction of life." Take Isa. 5: 20, "Let him know that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his ways shall save the spiritual and immortal part of man from death." Again, (Rev. 19: 3) "Every living and immortal part of man in the sea died." Again, (Ps. 78: 50.("And he spared not their spiritual and immortal part from death." Again, (Josh, 11: 11.) "And they smote all the spiritual and immortal parts that were therein with the edge of a sword, utterly destroying them." Also, (Pet. 3: 21.) "Wherein eight spiritual and immortal parts were saved by water." Also, (Gen. 1: 30.) "And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth on the earth, wherein there is a spiritual and immortal part." Margin, (Job 12: 10.) "The spiritual and immortal part of every living thing." (Isa. 53: 12.) "He hath poured out his spiritual and immortal part unto death." Thus we see the injustice which is done the word by such theology in these last days, it is wove into every fabric of literature almost, extant. Truly Paul foresaw and told of these days, when he says the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but shall turn away from the truth and be turned unto fables. Shall heap to themselves teachers of this stamp, thus indicating their plentifulness, but let us who know truth, tho' comparatively few, hold up the truth and let it shine, the few remaining moments we have, and then we shall rest in our heaven home.

THE Lord has so arranged his work that every one has something to do. If we love him we shall find abundant opportunities of doing him service. Can it be said of us, "They have done what they could?"

Materialism vs. Immaterialism.

A. N. SEYMOUR.

The above words seem to stand strictly at antipodes to each other. So that these terms, in their signification, are as distant as the poles from one another. Materialism embraces within its circle all created things, or substances, whether visible or invisible to the human eye. Immaterialism embraces, if I am allowed the expression, all noncreated things, non-essentials, things of no weight, consequence, or value. With material substances, all the race of man have more or less to do, all having more or less knowledge in regard to their importance and practical usefulness. With immaterial things the race of man have nothing to do, more than to gossip and speculate about,—having no knowledge or understanding relative to such things, if things they be. But do immaterial things exist? If so they must exist in space, and if they exist in space, they must occupy space, and if they occupy space they must bear a strong resemblance to material things, and if so they certainly ought to be perceptible to some of the fine senses. But where is the keen-eyed man whose vision is complete, and aided by the most powerful microscope ever invented by the genius of man, that can see, or ever has seen, immaterial things? One thing is certain, my own perceptibilities have never been so fortunate as to behold such an exhibition. And, for aught I know, I am just as fortunate in this respect as those who claim that immaterial things do exist, and pervade all society. But how is it known that such things exist? Do the Scriptures inspired by God even make use of the now common remark, "Immaterial things," souls, spirits, immateriality? No, not one. It is not a doctrine of Revelation. God does not recognize in it his manifold wisdom. Then certainly it must be of heathen or human origin.

From those two words two classes of religionists spring: The Spiritual Materialist, and the Spiritual Immaterialist. The one stands opposed to the other in faith. The Spiritual Materialist believes that a spiritual Deity having body, parts, and passions exists, as a personal spirit, and he worships him as such; believing "that he' that cometh to God must believe that he is, and is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him." But the Spiritual Immaterialist believes that an immaterial Deity exists, having no body, parts, or passions, without center, circumstance, or locality. There seems to be a vast difference between the two Deities. The difference seems to be as great between them as the difference between Israel's God and the gods of the heathen. One has life, majesty, dominion and glory, and can predict "the end from the begining," and "uphold all things by the word of his power;" while the other deities are minus all these qualifications. The former class of believers fully adopt "the faith once delivered to the Saints, pertaining to a material and incorruptible kingdom, to be located on the earth, under the whole heavens, to be possessed by them forever, having length, breadth, and circumference; while the second class have an immaterial heaven, having no geographical center, circumference, or locality, except that of the poet who anticipates a heavenly place beyond the bounds of time and space. The first class of believers fully indorse the doctrine of the literal personal coming of Christ, to literally raise his dead Saints from their literal graves, for the purpose of bestowing honor, glory, the Kingdom of God, the crown of glory, immortality, and eternal life upon them. But the opposite class cherish in their immaterialistic theology the doctrine of an immaterial Christ, coming at death, in a mysterious way, to convey immaterial souls, or spirits, far off to an immaterial home, which has no locality, center, or circumference, latitude or longitude. The first of these systems of faith is based upon many a "thus saith the Lord," found in both the Old and New Testament oracles, which all can read with "good cheer," if they will; while the other has nothing for its foundation better than simple imagination, and the proud assumption of mortal man. The first class rejects the faith, hope, and theology of the second class, and the second class ignores the theology, faith, and hope of the first class. With such a striking difference somebody certainly must be most sadly disappointed, when the great summing up time comes, when every man "shall be rewarded according to his deeds." In view of this, where should our faith rest? and while there is such a world wide difference in theological circles and in the religious world? Paul's masterly declaration of gospel truth will be found of great service to every honest soul, just here, "Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you, than that we have preached, let him be accursed." The gospel that Paul preached was the power of God, unto the salvation of every one that believeth. Upon this gospel all can rely and be safe, for it is heavenly wisdom flowing from the throne of the Eternal to a lost race,—lost in sin and death. This gospel is good news of a personal God, sending a personal Christ into this world to redeem a mortal, material race from all the consequences of sin, and to exalt them to the full enjoyment of all the glories of the Kingdom of God. Consequently I do not blush when I am called a materialist; I might were I an immaterialist.

The following poetry speaks intelligently:

"We choose all substance—what remains,
The mystical sectarian gains;
All that each claims each shall possess,
Nor grudge each other happiness.

We claim the earth, the air, and sky,
And all the starry world on high;
Gold, silver, ore and precious stones,
And bodies made of flesh and bones.

An immaterial God they choose,
An immaterial heaven and hell;
For such a God we have no use,
In such a heaven we can not dwell.

Our God, like us, can hear and see,
Feel, taste, and smell eternally;
Immortal brain through which to think,
Organs to speak, and eat, and drink.

Such is our God, our heaven, our all,
When once redeemed from Adam's fall;
All things are ours, and we shall be
The Lord's to all eternity."

The Soul Not Immortal,

AS REVEALED IN THE SCRIPTURES.

L. C. KERR.

"The Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." (Gen. 2: 7.)

It is astonishing, from the first account that we have of the soul, that there should be such a great misunderstanding as to its nature and existence. But however erroneous may be the theories of men on this point, it does not alter the revelation, or the nature and charaater of the subject in question. We hear a great deal in these days about the immortality of the soul, as though it was on every page of the Bible; and, indeed if it were, it could doubtless have had no more advocates. But while this doctrine is so universally taught and believed, we turn to the Scriptures to find its origin, expecting, from its being so prominently taught, as I just said, to find the Bible full of it; but, unfortunately for that theory, we do not find such a phrase once mentioned in the Bible, but just the opposite, the mortality of the soul. For we find immortality mentioned in the Scriptures, but never applied to the soul. Immortality is only mentioned five times, and immortal once, and is applied to God or the saints after the resurrection, and not before, as follows:

"To them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life." (Rom. 2: 7.) What is the use of seeking for a thing we already have in our possession? "This mortal must put on immortality .... And when this mortal shall have put on immortality [at the resurrection] then [not before] will be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory; O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" (1 Cor. 15: 53, 54.) "Who only hath immortality dwelling in the light." (1 Tim. 6: 16.) "But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." (2 Tim. 1:10.) "Now unto the King, eternal, immortal, invisible." (1 Tim. 1: 17.)

We find that immortal, in the Scriptures, qualifies the Deity, and not the soul, and thus far find a total lack of its immortality, and can say with propriety and fidelity, that the Scriptures do not teach the immortality of the soul; and, if they do, it is rather intimated than mentioned; and if not mentioned how are we to prove that such is its nature?

Having examined all the passages containing the words "immortality" and "immortal," we will return to our text, and in accordance with that we will notice, in order, some of the most important passages touching the soul.

"The Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed (or blew) into his nostrils the breath of life (n'shah-mah), and man become a living soul," or creature (nephesh.)

Here is the creation of the soul. It did not pre-exist us, as some argue, for he (the man) was formed out of the dust of the ground, and the very same thing that was thus formed, when breathed upon, became a living soul. Before that it was a lifeless soul. O but, says one, "that is your say-so for it." To which I reply, "If the man (the soul) became a living soul after the breath was breathed into his nostrils, it follows that he was not alive before he became so.

As we have shown in brief the creation of the soul, we shall as plainly show its death; and that, Biblically, by calling attention first to the 11th chapter and 11th verse of Joshua:

"And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them; there was not any left to breathe."

Can immortal souls be destroyed with the sword? This is rather ludicrous. Hear Job and others on the soul:

"He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword." (Job 33: 18.) "His (man's) soul draweth near unto the grave." (v 22.) What, an immortal soul draw near unto the grave? "Shall mortal man be more just than God?" (Ch. 4: 17.) "There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease; though the root thereof will wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground; yet through the scent of water it will bud and bring forth boughs like a plant. But man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up, so man lieth down and riseth not, till the heavens be no more; they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep." (Ch. 14: 7–12.)

. This does not look much like going to heaven at death. Job is here contrasting man with a tree, and says that there is hope of a tree; if it be cut down that it may grow again, but when man falls he rises not until the resurrection. This is the man proper. Whatever constitutes him, man goes to the grave at death, and not to heaven, as the masses teach; and this also agrees with another statement of Job, where he says, "Man that is born of a woman is of few days and full of trouble; he cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not." (vv. 2, 3) But this could not be true if the real man went to heaven at death, and thus become susceptible of all consciousness and knowledge; and, as we are told, knows what is going on on the earth, that when a man (if good) dies he goes to heaven, whence he can see the place of his former abode on earth, and if he has any children he can see how they are getting along. Why not know things on earth as well as in heaven, if possessed with such heavenly knowledge? But hark! "Thou prevailest forever against him (man), and he passeth; thou changest his countenance and sendest him away. His sons come to honor and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them." (Vv. 20, 21.) Can any one conceive of a fairer contradiction of inspiration than this? There is no place in the Bible which tells of men going to heaven at any period of time, but to the opposite. Hear the Saviour on this subject: "No man hath ascended up to heaven." (John 3: 13.) It does not avail anything to say that the body only is here referred to. It is the man that does not go to heaven, and if it is not the man that departs, what is it? It is just what Solomon says it is in the 12th chapter of Ecclesiastes, "the ruach," the breath of life.

We will next adduce testimony from David. He says: "All they that be put upon the earth shall eat and worship; and they that go down to the dust shall bow before him, and none can keep alive his own soul." (Ps. 22:29.) "He made a way to his anger; he spared not their soul from death." (Ps. 78: 50.) The most of people think that the death here referred to is eternal torment, a spiritual death, a death that never dies. But when they go to the Bible to find such a death, they meet with just as sad a disappointment as when looking for the immortal soul. "A death that never dies," is just as reasonable as "a life that never lives." Death is the extinction of life—just the opposite of life. While we witness a death-bed we behold the patient while in the agonies of despair, and say of him that he is dying; but while there is life there is hope; as soon as he expires life has become extinct, and not until that point of time can it be said that he is dead. And this fulfills the words of the Psalmist on this point, for he says: "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man (why?) for his breath goeth forth; he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." (Ps. 146: 3, 4.) "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." (Ps. 115: 17.) "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for he shall receive me." (Ps. 49: 15.)

We will now hear Solomon describe the nature of man. He says: "I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath, so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast, (why?) for all is vanity." [Can immortal souls, if such exist, be with propriety called vanity? There is a mistake somewhere, and we think it is in creeds, and not in inspiration.] "All go unto the one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" (Eccl. 3: 18–21.) The word, here rendered spirit, is the same as in ch. 12 and v. 7, where it says:.... "The spirit (or breath of life) shall return to God, who gave it." Solomon very adequately interrogates: "Who knoweth the spirit of a man that goeth upward, etc., when the heathen philosophers, were preaching the immortality of the soul, and leading the whole world astray with this erroneous doctrine; and, reasoning from this philosophy, we may conclude that it was those men who brought immortality to light, and not Christ who, Paul tells us, "hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." (2 Tim. 1:10.)

Unfulfilled Prophecy.

N. H. BARBOUR.

The signs of the times and the prophetic periods warrant us, we think, in looking for the Lord this present year, 1873. But is it possible that earth's history, as recorded by the pen of inspiration, can be accomplished so soon? Are there not unfulfilled prophecies which will require more time?

There is the "eastern question," to which so many are looking. (I refer to the eastern question as found in Ezek. 39: 1–5; Rev. 16: 12–14, and many other places.) "The kings of the east and of the whole world are to be gathered to the battle of the great day of God Almighty." If these and other like Scriptures are to have a fulfillment this side of the coming of Christ, how can we reasonably look for his advent this year? Indeed, it would appear as though many years must intervene, when we consider the number and magnitude of the events which are said to transpire in connection with the establishment of God's everlasting kingdom and the destruction of the wicked.

In view of these things I am constrained to locate the events, associated with "that great day," in the day of the Lord, and not prior to it.

In Dan. 2: 44, we read: "In the days of these kings (represented by the toes of the image), shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it (the kingdom) shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

Here we learn that this kingdom is to be set up "in the days of these kings," or kingdoms, and that it (the kingdom) is to "break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms." How can this be true if these kingdoms are all destroyed at the coming of Christ, and his kingdom established only on the ruins of this earth, or rather on the new and regenerated earth? Is there not a little space of time during which the wicked are to be destroyed, after Christ's coming, and prior to the time of universal peace? In other words, has not Christ a work to accomplish after he comes; and will not that work require time for its fulfillment? He had a work at his first advent, which took him several years. When he comes again, "his reward is with him, and his work before him."

What shall we do with such passages as, "These (ten kings) shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them." (Rev. 17: 14.) "And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army." (Rev. 10: 19.) Does not this look like the "gathering together of the kings of the east, and of the whole world to the battle of the great day?" This "making war with the Lamb" cannot be under and through the gospel, for the Lamb overcomes them; and a success in gospel warfare means conversion. But, it may be asked, will Christ and his servants actually fight and subdue these kings? So it reads, and such would seem to be Christ's teaching. "Jesus answered (Pilate), my kingdom is not of this world (age). If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." (John 14:36.) "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth sat themselves, and the rulers took counsel together against the Lord, and against his anointed, saying, let us break their bonds asunder, and cast away their cords from us. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision.... Thou shalt rule the nations with a rod of iron, and break them in pieces as a potter's vessel."

Surely, no one among us will say these prophesies are to be fulfilled before Christ comes. And if they are to have an accomplishment after his appearing, then it follows, as a matter of necessity, that this present state of things, changed more or less, perhaps, by the spirit of God having left the earth, must continue for a time after his coming. And if there is time, after his coming, who shall say it may not be years? If his work at the first advent took two or three years, is it unreasonable to suppose that all the events connected with the setting up of his kingdom, (for evidently it is a literal kingdom and a literal world), and then, that kingdom "breaking in pieces and consuming all these other kingdoms," would require, perhaps, twice as much time as the introduction of the gospel required, or even more than that.

That there is time after his coming, I think is proven in the parable of the virgins: "And the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him, and the door was shut; afterwards came also the other virgins saying," etc. Here is certainly an afterwards. Again, "In the day when the Son of Man is revealed, in that day he that is on the house-top, and his staff in the house, let him not come down to take it away. And he that is in the field, let him not return back;.... whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it." (Luke 17: 30–33.) This clearly teaches that in the day when the Son of Man is revealed there will be a period of time when the warning not to try to save our property, or our lives, will be necessary.

There are many Scripture teachings, that something is to be done after Christ comes—something more than simply burning the world.

"When the Son of Man shall come in his glory.... then shall he sit on the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations." This looks like "the kings of the east, and of the whole world," and their armies being gathered together for some purpose. There is no teaching in the Scriptures, making it necessary that all this should be brought about in a few moments, or even hours. God could, by a miracle, bring it about instantly, but such is not the way prophecy has been fulfilled heretofore. It has always taken time.

If, then, there is a period of time to transpire on this earth, after Christ comes, may not all of the—as yet unfulfilled—prophecy belong there? If so, may not Christ come and begin the work this year? If we have made the right application of the "abomination of desolation," in referring it to the papal church, then the 1335 "days" cannot be carried beyond the present year. For if the events of 1798, when the papal government was entirely abolished, and a republic established in its place, and the consumption of that reorganized power since, does not answer to the prophecy of "taking away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end," then his dominion is not yet taken away. For the events of 1870 did not take away his dominion so completely as did those of 1798. And if that work has not yet been accomplished, then the 1260 "days" are not yet ended, and there must of necessity be seventy-five years of time after that, before Daniel can stand in his lot. Hence, 1798 must be the end of the 1260 "days," or this generation will never live to see the coming of Christ.

With anything like our present application of prophecy, the 1335 days cannot be extended beyond A. D. 1873; hence, we cannot help believing that the resurrection of the dead in Christ will take place this year. But 1880 is a marked period in prophecy.

If the seventy years have any reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, as many of our brethren suppose, they evidently reach to A. D. 70, while the balance of the 2300 days, or 1810 years, would then expire with 1880, as some hold.

Though I do not endorse this application of the 2300 days, still there are two or three arguments independent of these days, which seem to make 1880 a marked period, (which I may present at some future time.) Is it not possible that this work of destruction, connected with "the days of the Lord," may begin this year, and continue for seven years?

I throw out these ideas as mere suggestions, believing there may be more light and knowledge for us than we have already. We are living in "the time of the end," when knowledge is to increase. The past is pretty clear; we have had our "tarrying," and I believe the midnight cry. And now "the morning cometh." But still the lamp holds out to burn, and is a light to our feet (if we but search), and I believe will make our pathway bright as we take the last few steps before entering the Celestial City.

Spirit in Man.

O. D. GIBSON.

I wish to say a little about this point. It seems to me that it is missed by some very much, or else I fail to comprehend them. I do not refer to the various meanings of the word, but to one only, which is when used in contradistinction to soul and body. What I wish to avoid is the confounding or mixing of things which should be kept separate. I notice that some in giving the meaning of spirit, give it as life. This I conceive to be wrong. And for this cause: Life is "vitality, action or motion," which is only the result, or effect, of certain causes; while spirit is a life-giving principle, or element, by which God has ordained that certain things are to live, move or act. We must not, therefore, confound the thing produced with the producer, the cause with the effect. Now if spirit were life itself, it would cease to be the producer, but be the product of some other producing cause. Now life is the result of the combining of two elements, or things, viz.: Spirit and visible matter; which visible matter is so constructed, (which we call organized,) so as to be especially adapted to the results, when it receives the life-giving element, or spirit. Now all this can occur thus far, and not have one whit of intelligence in either of the elements by themselves, nor yet when combined, and life be produced. For there can be organism in which there is life, but it may be asked: How is it? Are not men and animals intelligent? They have living organisms; yes, certainly. But more, they have a peculiar feature in their organism adapted to that peculiar result, without which there could be no intelligence, or thought. I mean that little machine called the brain; where this is lacking, although there may be life, yet there is no intelligence. And even where there is brain, if there is no motion, or action, then there is no intelligence; for by the action of this machine thought is produced. This is proven in various ways. So then all organized matter does not think, else the hand or feet would think; but it takes a peculiar structure or machine, and that machine in motion, to have intelligence, or thought. Yes, but what puts the machine in motion? This brings us back to the cause, or life, element, or principle, called spirit,—which must be combined with the machine, or organism, in order to obtain a product. To illustrate: We wish to produce a crop. What now is necessary? First there must be seed, and soil; you put these into their proper position to each other. Will you now get a crop? No, not unless there are two other elements, or agents, combined with these, which are moisture, and heat. If you lack either of these you get no crop. So it is with man; he is organized a noble structure, with a thinking apparatus attached. Thus he was made in the beginning of dust, but still there was no thinking. Another element is essential, which is a gift from God. (Eccl. 12: 7.) Well, what was this spirit, when He gave it? (See Gen. 2: 7.) It was a vitalizing power, or element, called spirit, or "breath of life," which He put into this organism which He had made. What was the result? Why, this being, or organism, became a moving, living, active being, or soul. This "breath of life" was not intelligence, nor yet was the machine it propelled, but this machine put in motion by the vitalizing fluid, the "breath of life," the product is thought, or intelligence. Take away this element, the machine stops. Thought stops, man is dead. "His breath (of life) goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." (Ps. 146:4.) "For as the body without the breath (margin) is dead, so faith without work is dead also." (Jas. 2: 26.) "Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon the slain, that they may live." (Ez. 37:9.) We might quote many texts, showing breath to be the life-giving element, which God has chosen—in which and by which all living creatures live; the fish of the sea, even, cannot live without it. Thus we see, spirit should never be defined as life, it being one of the combined elements that produce life. (See Job 33: 4; Ps. 104: 29.)

Some are very loth to admit that breath, or air, should be the life-giving element by which we are vitalized and live, as though it were degrading. But why may not this be God's chosen avenue, or medium as well as any other? But all animals live by the same. True, so do animals eat fruit, vegetables and meat as well as man, but does this degrade man? It is truth we want, and not self-exaltation. It is better to heed the apostle when he says, "To every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but to think soberly." It is better for us to know that we "are from breath," "are of this world," of "the earth earthly," "are flesh," and perishing flesh at that; hence, need saving. When we discover this we may then begin to cry, "Lord save, or I perish." Then are we in our true position, and never until then. O that God would open the eyes of mortals to see their truly lost condition, with only one chance of eternal life—and that in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Preaching.

Lawyers do not care to hear preaching upon law, nor doctors upon physic, nor artists upon art, nor business men upon banks and cotton and railroad securities. They know more of these things than ministers do. They want the pure, fresh, and simple Gospel, applied with all wisdom to the regulation of human motives, words, and deeds, and to the wants of living men. But they want it also as "spiritual refreshment," the manna of the desert pathway, the stream that follows them from its source in the smitten Rock. They have enough of secular things all the six days of the week, but on the Lord's day let them have some of His "heavenly meat and drink." Every pastor of an educated and intelligent people will testify that their most learned Christian parishioners are less critical, less exacting, and far more inspiring hearers than those who have only a smattering of science and literature.

The Christian Life.

The Christian's Good-Night.

The early Christians were accustomed to bid their dying friends good-night, so sure were they of their awaking at the resurrection morning.

Sleep on, beloved, sleep, and take thy rest,
Lay down thine head upon the Savior's breast;
We love thee well, but Jesus loves thee best:
Good-night.

Calm is thy slumber, as an infant's sleep,
But thou shalt wake no more to toil and weep;
Thine is a perfect rest, secure and deep,
Good night.

Until the shadow from this earth is cast,
Until he gathers in his sheaves at last,
Until the twilight gloom is overpast,
Good-night.

Until the Easter glory lights the skies;
Until the dead in Jesus shall arise;
And he shall come, but not in lowly guise,
Good night.

Until made beautiful by love divine,
Thou in the likeness of thy Lord shalt shine;
And he shall bring that golden crown of thine,
Good-night.

Only "Good-night," beloved, not farewell;
A little while, and all his saints shall dwell
In hallowed union indivisible;
Good-night.

Until we meet again before his throne,
Clothed in the spotless robes he gave his own;
Until we know, even as we are known:
Good-night.

Star Depths.

The mind of man utterly fails to realize the immensity of space, and no one unaccustomed to the use of the telescope can have an adequate idea of the difference presented by the heavens when viewed by the naked eye, even upon a clear night, and the scene which is disclosed to the eye and mind of the astronomer. How difficult it is to realize that each star in the solemn depths of the universe is a sun like our own sun, but separated from each other and our own by distances almost beyond the power of man to compute.

Only about three thousand stars can be distinctly seen and counted by the naked eye, while an ordinary telescope reveals the presence of something like three hundred and fifty thousand. Herschel's great eighteen-inch instrument, it is estimated, shows one hundred and eighty millions, while the great Rosse telescope, by its vast penetrating power, is supposed to open up to our vision not less than seven hundred millions. And yet, when the whole heavens are swept by this telescope, we have only penetrated a distance into space from our stand-point on this globe which, when compared to the immensity beyond, is no more than the space occupied by the room where we write or read is to the immensity of depth penetrated by the last-mentioned instrument.—Sel.

The Gospel not Gloomy.

The gospel gloomy! It is an anthem from the harps of heaven, the music of the river of life, washing its shores on high and pouring in cascades upon the earth. Not so cheerful was the song of the morning stars, nor the shout of the sons of God so joyful. Gushing from the fountains of eternal harmony, it was first heard on earth in a low tone of solemn gladness uttered in Eden by the Lord God himself. This gave the key note of the gospel song. Patriarchs caught it up and taught it to the generations following. It breathed from the harp of the psalmist, and rang like a clarion from tower and mountain top as prophets proclaimed the year of jubilee. Fresh notes from heaven have enriched the harmony, as the Lord of hosts and his angels have revealed promises, and called on the suffering children of Zion to be joyful in their King. Bondage and exile, from dens and caves, from bloody fields and fiery stakes and peaceful death-beds, have they answered, in forces which cheered the disconsolate and made oppressors shake upon their thrones, while sun and moon, and all the stars of light, stormy wind fulfilling his work, the roaring sea and the fullness thereof, mountains and hills, fruitful trees and all the trees of the wood, have rejoiced before the Lord, and the coming of his anointed, for the redemption of his people and the glory of his holy name. —Dr. Graves.

Advent Christian Times.

Wm. Sheldon, - Editor.

Give your Name, Postoffice, County and State every time you write.

CHICAGO, Tuesday, August 5, 1873.

We are glad to see that Br. G. W. Teeple is soon to visit the West—whether to locate permanently we are not informed.

In the lease published last week, by mistake the name of A. S. Calkins was substituted for E. McCulloch, as one of the trustees of the Publishing Society.

Br. E. McCulloch, pastor of the church at Nevada, O., contemplates visiting the East this month, to attend the national camp meeting at Springfield, Mass.

We learn that Br. P. G. Bowman, from South Carolina, is making a visit in New England, and is expected to attend the great camp meetings to be held at Tremont, Springfield, and Alton Bay.

Please Remember.—While we offer a book to new subscribers, please remember that the book must always be called for at the time the subscriber's name is forwarded, instead of calling for the book at a late date, as we cannot send the book on any other consideration.

In several of our editorials, last week, the sense was entirely destroyed by omitting a whole line of the manuscript at a time by the printer, which passed uncorrected in proof-reading. We hope such serious mistakes will not again render articles meaningless. in part, or incomprehensible to the reader.

Our Free List.—A Baptist minister living in this State thus writes us: "If you can send me The Times, free, it would be thankfully received." It should be a pleasure to our friends to help us supply such calls. Who can tell the good yet to come out of a compliance with this request? Who will help place the office in a condition to comply with such calls for the torch of truth?

Amount of the Debt.—In calling for pledges to liquidate the debt of the Society, that all may judge how liberally they should subscribe, let it be remembered that the debt is larger than at first supposed, being now about $4,000. The property of the Society is estimated at about $14,000. Now this debt is not to be met by a few stingy donations. Our $500 men must come to the front, and our $100 men must rush to the rescue.

The Methodist Recorder says: "We have found great satisfaction in using 'The Emphatic Diaglott,' in which may be had the full text of the original, with a complete interlinear translation, besides a revised and modernized version in the margin. For a hand-book of reference, making due allowance for the translator's peculiar views on the doctrines of baptism and soul-drowsiness after death, we heartily commend this work by Benjamin Wilson. In the main it is clear and accurate, and where a larger work is unattainable, this will render efficient service.

Tracts for the South.—We intend to scatter several hundred copies of our new tract South gratuitously, on these conditions:

1. Orders must be sent, not to the office, but to Wm. Sheldon, Brodhead, Green Co., Wis., to save confusion.

2. All orders must be sent before the close of the month of August.

Any northern friends who may wish to aid a trifle can do so by addressing as above.

All other orders must be sent to the Business Agent, 25 West Lake street, Chicago.

Begging.—We have a disrelish for begging ordinarily; but the dilemma in which our western publishing interest is involved, demands that we beg, and earnestly beg all lovers of truth to lend a helping hand. Let floods of pledges come in without a week's delay, to be paid on or before Jan. 1, 1874; provided, the whole amount is previously pledged, not to be paid otherwise. We want the debt blotted out, and then keep out of debt for time to come. We feel sure that many will help on these terms, who would otherwise do nothing. Do not hesitate, but say at once what you will do.

Matter for our Paper.—While we shall allow a reasonable margin of leniency in the expression of different views in The Times, we do not intend to subvert the object of the paper by making it an unlimited and unrestrained advocate of every speculative view that may be sent to us, and which the sender may deem important. The paper has a specific mission—a mission of unsurpassed importance—and side issues must not be made so conspicuous as to prove subversive of the real design of the paper. Let our writers give prominence to our great message—the immediate coming of Christ to reign on earth, and the requisite preparation to meet him.

Now In Press.

A new tract will soon be ready for circulation, entitled:

The Disembodied State Examined,
With an exposition of
"OUR EARTHLY HOUSE,"
And
THE RICH MAN'S HELL.
By Wm. Sheldon.

The price will probably be 10 cents single, or $1.00 per dozen, by mail. Orders can be sent now to the Business Agent, so as to be among the first to be supplied. Better order by the dozen, so as to give or lend to your neighbors, and thus do good to them and help the office at the same time. The profits will go to the Society instead of the author.

Tare Seed.

Eld. Job Brown, having heard that we have recently changed our views concerning the nature of the future age, inquires: "Where do you get your tare seed for the next crop, as the tares are all burned up in the end of this world?" (Matt. 13: 10.) The report about our change of views on this topic is not true. It doubtless had its rise in the recent republication of articles written over twenty years ago, when we held to the gathering of the Jews, which view we found unscriptural over fifteen years ago, and have never since seen any gospel light in it. Indeed, when the entire crop of tares are consumed, seed and all, we know not where seed would come from for another crop.

The Locusts.

Br. B. inquires: "How can the locusts of Rev. 9: 3, that appear under the seventh seal be applied to the Turkish soldiers, or Mohammedan soldiers, that existed long years before the seventh seal?"

We reply: 1. Instead of being seen under the seventh seal, it was under the sounding of the fifth trumpet. 2. The impression sometimes imbibed, that the entire seven trumpets belong under the seventh seal, is a mistake. A wrong division of chapters has led some to this conclusion. When the chain of seals is finished, then a new chain is given—a chain of trumpets—beginning back, and coming down to the judgment again. The sixth seal introduces the "day of wrath;" but under the trumpets that day does not come till the seventh trumpet sounds. (Rev. 11: 18.) The "day of wrath" does not come twice, but two distinct chains of events reach down to the same day. The trumpets all precede that day of wrath due under the sixth seal.

The Northern Lights.

A writer in the Church Advocate makes the following sensible remarks about the Northern Lights:

"Although the Aurora Borealis has made some wonderful displays in former ages, yet it tends to refresh our minds of the fact that the world and all its elements are to be dissolved with fervent heat. It is the duty of all to be also ready, for we know not what hour the Bridegroom cometh. The Aurora is supposed by the best philosophers to be of an electrical nature, as its appearance can be imitated by artificial electricity. But whatever may be the causes of these lights, they present to our view one of the grandest and most sublime, and at the same time awful and mysterious phenomena that are to be seen in our nocturnal sky. And God may see fit to add to these flames a sufficient amount of the electrical fluid to melt our world in a moment of time, when he sees fit to purify it from sin."

As the atmospheric heavens are waxing old, like a garment, these displays are more frequent and brilliant; indeed, they are mostly confined to the past century.

"After He Hath Killed."

Will you be kind enough to help us a little on Luke, ch. 12, v. 5? "Fear him, which, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell," etc. L. Mann.

The death which men inflict is temporal; here their power ends. God, too, sometimes inflicts temporal death as a calamity, as when he caused the earth to swallow up Core and his company; as when he submerged the Egyptians in the Red Sea; as when he rained fire upon Sodom, and as in many instances where life is cut short by Providence. But after men are thus killed, or fall under temporal death by calamities from the hand of God, the work that he can do is not ended: "After he hath killed he hath power to cast into hell." How long after? After he shall "reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished," when they that have done evil shall come forth "unto the resurrection of damnation"—then comes the second death in the lake of fire. The second death is not inflicted preparatory to being cast into the lake of fire, but that is its cause—death the result.

A Charge.

A correspondent writes us: "I had your 'Life and Death Theology' presented to me with a heavy charge that the author acted unfairly by accusing the orthodox clergy of holding the view that the theory of eternal torment, to begin at death, torments men longer than devils are to be tormented." Our argument reads thus:

3. "It sends men to the hell of punishment before devils go there, which is a shocking conclusion, as they were the instigators of man's rebellion, being both the oldest and the greatest criminals in the universe; and they are still among men, having often been cast out of men, once crying out, 'Art thou come to torment us before the time?' showing that they were not then in a hell of torment; 'for the angels that sinned' were only cast 'down to hell' [tartarus], not to be punished there, but 'to be reserved unto judgment.' (2 Pet. 2:4.) This is the only instance where the word tartarus is used in the Bible; and it here represents the restricted abode of demons, till the arrival of the judgment, in the atmosphere encircling our globe, where 'the prince of the power of the air' now dwells.

4. "It torments men longer than the devils are to be tormented; thus giving fallen men a severer punishment than fallen angels are to experience, by sending them to a hell of punishment long before the fallen angels go to that place."

Yes; in view of the fact that devils do not go to the hell of punishment till the arrival of the judgment, if the theory be true that sends men to the hell of damnation before the judgment, there is no escape from the charge that this theory "torments men longer than devils are to be tormented." We did not charge ministers with claiming that this is the case; but we charged it upon the theory held by them, provided the Bible theory of the time of the damnation of devils is true. If they enter hell before devils do, and both remain there eternally, certainly they would be tormented longer than devils.

Social Meetings.

Lengthy exhortations are well in their proper place, and are often productive of as much good as a lengthy sermon; but, when in a social meeting, let "the spirit of the prophets be subject to the prophets;" and let no one conclude, because he feels like speaking long, that he has a right to monopolize time that belongs to another. On this point we expressed our mind in another paper, and being still of the same opinion, we here reiterate it:

Meeting killers are too numerous, and a few hints to prevent their ruinous depredations may not come amiss to the cause. They are not always a bad class of men, but are often found among our best brethren; and the worst feature about the matter is, they keep on killing meetings, and do not know that they have done any harm, and so kill another, and still another. Let me particularize:

1. A social meeting is in full blast, and everything seems melting before it, when a brother gets up and introduces something entirely foreign to the current of the meeting, and tries to turn the meeting into another channel. All he says may be well upon a proper occasion, but under the circumstances it is like throwing a cake of ice into the fire. When will brethren learn to keep in the current of the meeting?

2. Perhaps several ministers are present, and they must lengthen out a speech because they are ministers; and, though all they say is good in its place, they kill the meeting. When will they learn to place themselves on a level with common brethren in a social meeting? Be just as short as any brother. If the heart is full let it boil over, but do not monopolize the time because you can speak long, or love to speak long. It is no place for speech making, or display of talents. Some seem to fear that it will not be understood that they are ministers unless they talk long. Well, better let it remain unknown than to make a meeting-killer of yourself. You are robbing your brethren, and that is not honest. I have seen more social meetings killed by preachers than any other class of people. Let this thing be stopped. Half minute speeches in a large social meeting will do more good than long exhortations. There is a proper time for exhortation, and sermons, but not in a social meeting. Let us be patterns of brevity and promptness in such meetings.

3. Another class, who cannot have their own way in spoiling social meetings by long speeches, or by introducing themes contrary to the current of the meeting, adopt another plan. They sit still, say nothing, and pull back like a balky mule. But I never knew one of these meeting-mules to get blest. They generally have a hard time after meeting. Now, brother, which class of meeting-spoilers do you belong to? Do you talk out of the current of the meeting? Do you talk long, and rob others? Or do you sit and hold back? Let us be, in such meetings, earnest, prompt, and brief. When all act on this principle, we are sure of a good meeting.

The Preparation.

In the ordinary course of human affairs it is well to be prepared for any emergency; and when we are duly apprised of the approach of any disastrous event, we are apt to make preparations to meet it. But how different in matters pertaining to futurity. We are apprised that the judgment of the great day is about to dawn, and yet we are not half awake to the mighty fact. We assent to the truthfulness of the proclamation, but are not sufficiently stirred to activity. When we are fully ready to meet our coming Judge, we cannot be inactive, but our hearts will burn with anxiety for perishing men around us. And unless we possess this spirit of anxiety for judgment bound mortals, we need to distrust our own acceptance of the Lord. Nor can we possess this anxiety without showing it by corresponding works—secret prayer for them, accompanied by both personal and public entreaties to lead them to the all cleansing fountain now open for sin and uncleanliness.

"The Spirit and the bride say come;" and our anxiety to repeat this call, "come," can be measured by the proportion of the Spirit possessed by us; and when we are "filled, with the Spirit," the constant cry of our heart will be, Sinner, "come"—come to Christ—"let him that is athirst come." A preparation to meet Christ, qualifies us for this work; and unless we are prepared for this work, we are not ready to meet Christ. It is the very work which we have been called to do, and how can we stand approved unless we do it?

The important question, Are we ready? should be followed by another question of like importance, Are we at work? It is useless to flatter ourselves with the idea that we are ready, while our talent is hid in a napkin, or buried from human sight. It is vain to claim that we have light enough to save us, if that light is kept under a bushel. The preparation that Jesus will recognize as genuine, at his coming, is one that will enable him to say of us—"Well done, good and faithful servant." He can never say this to a dilatory professor—to one who has been inactive.

The impression that pardon for past sins is the only feature in the great work of preparation to meet Jesus, is all wrong; subsequent obedience is equally essential. "Go work in my vineyard," is the divine command. The feeling of the submissive heart is "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Jesus has something for each one to do till he returns from heaven—"occupy till I come." And how can we be prepared to meet him, unless we are found occupying at his return? As Jesus, at his first advent, came to call sinners to repentance, we in our work should partake of the same spirit, to seek and to save the lost.

Truth should be used as a means to this end, and not as a means of gaining the mastery over an opponent for selfish and sensual gratification. In doing the Lord's work in the sweet Spirit of Jesus, we shall be found ready for the judgment day.

Spiritual Kingdom.

An article in the Christian Advocate contains a few remarks on this theme expressive of the popular sentiment, to which we make reference. The Advocate affirms:

"Religion always had its seat in the heart—was always "experimental," as well as theoretical and practical. God always had a church upon the earth, and there never was a time when the great essential elements of the kingdom of God, subjectively considered, "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," were not experienced by true believers. But since the Christian dispensation was inaugurated, or the kingdom of heaven was set up in its peculiar evangelical character, as predicted by the prophets and the Baptist, the Holy Spirit has been imparted in larger measures and with more copious effusions than before."

Mark well these points:

1. "Righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," are firstly pronounced "elements of the kingdom of God." That is correct.

2. It is also stated: "There never was a time when these great essential elements," "were not experienced by true believers." This is also correct.

3. Then how does it happen that "since the Christian dispensation was inaugurated," the kingdom of heaven was set up"? Certainly if "righteousness, peace and joy," instead of being, as first stated, "mere elements of the kingdom," must now be changed into the kingdom itself, it follows that this kingdom preceded the gospel dispensation, since these elements were previously enjoyed by believers. Nor will it avail anything to talk about the "evangelical charater" of "righteousness, peace, and joy"—as though these elements had changed their character. And how would it have sounded for the Baptist to proclaim "righteousness, peace, and joy is at hand," when indeed it had been in existence for many centuries? To say it was to be "imparted in larger measures," does not alter the fact that it existed before. John would not have proclaimed something "at hand" that had come centuries previously.

The Advocate then quotes from Watson's Dictionary:

"The kingdom was typified by the Jewish theocracy, and declared to be at hand by John the Baptist, and by Christ and his apostles also in the days of his flesh; but it did not come with power till Jesus rose from the dead and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high. (Acts 2: 32–37.) Then was he most solmnly inaugurated, and proclaimed King of the New Testament church, amidst admiring myriads of attendant angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. Then were fulfilled the words of Jehovah by the psalmist David, 'I have set my King upon my holy hill of Zion.' (Ps. 2:6.) This is that spiritual empire to which he himself referred when interrogated before Pontius Pilate, and in reference to which he said, 'My kingdom is not of this world.' (John 18:36, 37.) His empire, indeed, extends to every creature, for 'all authority is committed into his hands, both in heaven and on earth,' and he is 'head over all things to the church;' but his kingdom primarily imports the gospel church, which is the subject of his laws, the seat of his government, and the object of his care; and being surrounded with powerful opposers, he is represented as ruling in the midst of his enemies."

1. Here Watson defers the coming of the kingdom till Christ's assension, and yet quotes Christ's assertion that "all power" was given him, as proof of Christ's kingship; but this statement was made before he ascended, and if it proves him king at all, it proves him such before his assension. Nor is the "holy hill of Zion" in heaven, but on earth; and there Messiah's throne will be located when the time comes for him to begin his reign.

2. Christ's statement here quoted, "my kingdom is not of this world," no more proves that it will not be on this earth when set up, than his statement to his disciples, "ye are not of this world," proves they were not on earth. And if it really meant that Christ's kingdom could not be located on earth, it would destroy the Advocate's claim of a kingdom of "righteousness, peace, and joy," as well as the theory of a literal kingdom to come on earth. But the Revelator tells us of a time to come when the seventh trumpet shall sound, then adding: "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." (Rev. 11: 15.)

3. It is asserted: "His kingdom primarily imports the gospel church." But is not that church in the world? Here we have the kingdom first located in heaven above, then brought back to earth; at one time being constituted of "righteousness, peace, and joy," and at another time being composed of the church. We deny that the church is the kingdom in any other sense than being one of the ingredients that shall help compose it hereafter, being thus sometimes called by the name of the whole, as are also the other ingredients—the King and territory. All these elements exist in an unorganized state, and must be brought together in order to the establishment of the kingdom. The King must return, the territory be cleansed, and the subjects be changed.

We quote again:

"In the second petition of the Lord's Prayer, 'Thy kingdom come,' the disciples comprehended the ushering in of the gospel dispensation, as well as its universal triumph. As offered by us, it means, Let thy reign become universal by the conversion of the world to Christ. And till that event shall take place, and the kingdom shall be set up, not only in all lands, but in every heart, it will be our duty to pray, 'Thy kingdom come.'"

If "thy kingdom come" really means "the ushering in of the gospel dispensation," why continue to pray for the gospel dispensation to come hundreds of years after it has come? To come is one thing; to become universal is another thing. And how a "dispensation" can come into the hearts of mortal men who do not live long enough to see the fortieth part of a dispensation, is a mystery hard to solve.

Again, if "kingdom" meant a dispensation when the disciples offered the prayer, how can its meaning be changed to signify the "conversion of the world" when we offer the same prayer? If the Lord's prayer has changed its meaning once, may it not change again? But who is warranted in saying that Christ is now King? He is our High Priest now, but will "judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom." At present he is only a prospective King; but when the seventh trumpet sounds he will "reign forever and ever" over "the kingdoms of this world," when freed from the wicked, who are then to be destroyed—not converted.

A Grand Testimony

AGAINST CATHOLICISM BY AN EMINENT ROMAN CATHOLIC STATESMAN.

Von Schulte is professor of law in the old Catholic University at Prague. He is "one of the most eminent of the Roman Catholic statesmen of the Austrian Empire." At the close of the "Catholic Congress" at Cologne, he arose and said:

"Suffer me without false varnish, with the pencil of truth, the pencil of an honest indignation, to depict the life of a Catholic from his birth to his death.

"In order to be born, one must have parents; so that we begin with marriage. When parties wish to marry they go to the priest. Then come up a multitude of 'impediments.' Let me remind you, by the way, that I have been for sixteen years judge of ecclesiastical courts of first, second and third instance, so that you will grant that I have had some experience in these matters. Well, then, the priest examines into the 'impediments to marriage.' If there be none, then let the fees be paid and it is all right. But if there be one, they will have to get a dispensation. Sometimes it can be had from the bishop, at others it must come from Rome; it can always be had if you pay enough for it. In Whitsuntide, 1869, the Archbishop of Bamburg told me (I was his guest at the time) that when he was Bishop of Augsburg, Rome refused consent to a marriage because the bridegroom could not pay; but by and by he succeeded in scraping together the sixty-three or seventy florins, and then he got the dispensation.

"Next, the parties must be examined in religion—that is, unless they belong to the so called upper classes. In that case it is not required. In some dioceses they must bring a certificate of confession, to show that they have been to the sacrament. They often buy them of old women for ten cents apiece. I speak of it with utter indignation, for this is the sort of thing which corrupts every sentiment of religion. Well, suppose the parties have got on so far; if some one suggests that it would be pleasanter to have the wedding in the evening, then there has to be another dispensation. Poor people must be married in the forenoon; rich folks may marry in the evening if they like. It does not look very Christian!

"By and by a child is born. In a poor family it must be carried to church to be baptized, even though it be a two or three hours' walk, so that in winter the germs of death or disease get planted in the young life. But everybody that can pay his ducat gets his child baptized at home. In Vienna, baptism at home is the privilege of property owners; baptism in church is the privilege of bastards.

"The child goes to school. What sort of religious instruction does it get? I may safely appeal to the experience and the heart of each one of you. Can anything be more deplorable than our catechisms? I assure you I have often been made anxious and troubled when my children have come home, saying, 'We don't understand this.' There are things prematurely discussed in the catechisms, of which, in a good education, no child needs to know. * * * *

"Take the actual facts. Till within a few years the schools of Italy, one and all, from the university down to the primary schools, were in the hands of the clergy. It was so in Spain and Portugal, in most of the States of South America, and in France. To be sure, in France there was no compulsion; but as a matter of fact, the girls are everywhere educated in nunneries. Among the cultivated classes the child is sent into the country at an early age to be brought up. At six or seven years ol the girl goes into a nunnery, to stay till she is seventeen. Thus it is that it comes about that the men are atheists and the women bigots. The husband fails to find in the wife what he has the right to look for. And what has become of these countries? They are in a state of permanent revolution, of incessant social war. As soon as a crisis breaks out there begins a persecution against the church such as never takes place anywhere else in the world. Such are the results of ecclesiastical education!

"Is it true, then, that the priesthood have really undertaken the business of education with complete success? At the public school in Brilon I saw the parish priest (besides examination days) twice in two years, and both times he came to give one of the boys a flogging—once for stealing his apples and once for insulting his housekeeper. In a mechanical way, religion in the form of the catechism is beaten into the head; and I know, alas! from my own experience and from that of many and many of my friends, that by this process one comes utterly indifferent to all religion. * * * Never once in the primary school, never once in the high school, have I seen the Holy Scriptures in the original in the hand of a teacher; never once have we read the Scriptures. The Word of God is for the Catholic a sealed book. It figures here and there, indeed, in handsome bindings on the table; but where are the Scriptures read by Catholics? An education like this has, of course, its far-reaching consequences. The religious culture is a sheer formality. We learn the names of the seven deadly sins, of the sins against the Holy Ghost, etc.; we can tell all this off on our fingers, but as for actual religion—the religion of the soul, of love, the apprehension of the Word of God—of this we have in general not the slightest inkling.

"And how is it with subsequent education? Has the Catholic clergy actually provided any adequate training for the duties of life, particularly for the fair sex—'the pious sex, as the breviary calls them, for Rome knows how to be very gallant to the ladies! My honored hearers, I can say from my own experience that thousands of unhappy couples have come before me as judge, and I have found in the great majority of cases that the fault was on the woman's side, because she knew nothing of the duties of a wife. To understand these, she needs to be on an intellectual equality with her husband, and not a mere devotee or pietist. She must be able to engage and hold the attention of his mind, to be his intellectual partner. Now, I ask, is this made any part of her education? What does the education of our convents and boarding schools consist in? To get up at five o'clock; after dressing, to go to church; then comes breakfast; and then a mechanical round of study hours. Not a word about the duties of life! Whatever may tend to counteract the system into which the young girl is to be trained is kept carefully out of sight. After a few years of this sort of education, she becomes a wife, and we have the result which you see in most Catholic countries—for instance, in my native Westphalia, the husbands see their wives and children at table noon and evening; the rest of the time they are either at work or at the tavern. This is why family life is sunk so low in Catholic countries. The divorces granted among Protestants are no evidence that married life among them is at a low level. The best test of married life is family life. According to my observation, family life in North Germany is three-fold better than in South Germany; and in the Protestant families, take them by and large, far better than in the Catholic families. What is, and must be the woman's main business in life? I do not speak of cooking and housekeeping. When the housework is done, then, according to her spiritual director, her main duty is this: to go to church a great deal, to say her beads a great deal, to go to confession very often, as so on as she has done anything. 'My dear child, I entreat you, as soon as you have sinned, just come and confess; then it's all forgiven and all's right again.' That is the way it goes.

"Whoever is willing to act this part—to make an outside show of church-going; to belong to such and such societies; in the case of a man, to the Catholic club, where he can have a jolly good Catholic time every day (there is no objection to that); to take sides outwardly with the Vatican; to come down handsomely with Peter's pence—such an one is an eminent Catholic and may do as he pleases about everything else. Of course, to be a thoroughly good Catholic he must have a good many masses said, which can always be done if you have the money to pay for it; and the more masses the better Christian. And when it comes at last, to dying, it is much the same. The poor devil who cannot pay for a funeral attendance will be stuck into the ground without it, and the man that can pay can have as many priests as he pays for. As for the other world, that is provided for, since the fourteenth century, by the indulgence theory, as it comes down to us from Pope John XXIII.

"What is the result of this system? First, a religion of outward works. Secondly, of necessity, absolute control over persons so trained and guided. And for such control the means are not lacking. It would take a long time to show this in detail. As for the clergy, the means consists of a two-fold corruption of their entire education: First, through the methods by which science is completely perverted. They systematically incapacitate people from thinking. Through sheer drill in formal religious exercises they are brought into such an intellectual condition as to be no longer capable of free thought. After a few years of this drill they have lost the habit of thinking, and acquired that of acting in prescribed formulas. Such are the instruments. There are many honorable exceptions; but, speaking of the great majority, the means of the subjection of society are found in a clergy which, because it knows no family, has no interest in that of which the family is the foundation—in the community, the State, the whole structure of society.

"Through this religion of externals, through this clergy, through the power which the clergy exercises by such formidable means, the operations are carried on! What abuse of authority in families! Has it not come to this, that children, especially daughters, no longer consult their parents on the question whether to enter the convent. This is a question for the father-confessor alone to decide. To whom do we owe the first of human duties? To the Church? No! first of all to father and mother. The fifth commandment is the foundation of human society; and if there be a man who sets himself against it, who recks nothing of the blessing and the curse of parents, on which the happiness of life depends, he is the basest of all men. But this is kept completely out of sight. We are taught, 'if you do what the church wishes, you have a right to do it, whether your parents like it or not.' And with sorrow be it said that, as thousands of examples prove, true filial piety is destroyed, and what is the result? If I should try to depict the actual condition of things in Catholic countries, it would make a most unpleasant chapter. While in most evangelical countries it is the general rule that a young woman marries the person with whom she has first been on terms of courtship, with her parents' approval, you find in multitudes of cases in Catholic countries that the bride has had a half dozen previous love affairs. It is the practical consequence of such a system. A week ago I asked a young lady what made her father so bitter against the clergy. She answered: 'I had my trunk all packed to leave, because I had been so tormented at the confessional to become a nun; when accidentally father came in, and since then it is all up.'

"As in the family, so is it in the town. Those who have wormed their way into the home, to domineer there, are domineering also in the community. How does it go at elections? When there is an election for a burgomaster, the question in Catholic circles is not whether the candidate is fit or unfit. Only let him do what the Ultramontane leaders want, and he is just the man for the place. How is it in the State? . . . Suppose that the constitution, the organization of a nation is a vital thing, the outgrowth of its history. What right has the Pope to declare, for instance, the constitution of Austria to be null and void? We have got to hold firmly to what the people need. In opposition to his pretensions stand the axioms which I have enunciated and which you all know.

"But it is not only the State that is attacked. Every foundation principle of nationality is impugned. What has ever been done by Rome for the uplifting of the nations? On the contrary, everything has been done to hold them down. Is there any nobler means of uplifting any nationality than that its language should be used in the holiest and sublimest of human acts? And yet the idea of this is persistently scouted.

"It is this religion of outward works, it is all these corruptions, these means of subjection, which have erected Ultramontanism into a system. It is a wrong system, for it sets the false for the true, and breaks down authority in family, in church, and in State. This system has its germinant point in the infallibility dogma; and, therefore, fight we that dogma.

"A Bishop said to me, in the autumn of 1870, as I was talking with him on the subject: 'I will never publish the dogma in my diocese.' I told him: 'But you will publish it just like the rest.' And, as we talked further, he remarked: 'To be sure, there are a good many that accept the dogma. That I can understand, for the people know nothing about it. But as for you, you cannot do otherwise than as you do. If you should, I should lose all respect for you.' That is a true word. If we should do otherwise we should lose all respect for ourselves. We should give proof that we, too, had fallen victims to that system in which faith, love, and Christianity have been supplanted by that mere show of outward sanctity, that religion of works which engendered amongst us the lamentable schism of the sixteenth century, and which, if it be not again overthrown, will be the ruin of civilization, not for the present only, but forever."

This speech illustrates the spirit and purpose of the anti-infallibilityists, who are now pressing the war of opposition to that dogma throughout Germany. Heaven help and succeed them for Jesus' sake. Amen. C. C. M.

Miscellaneous.

AT HOME.

—The conflagration in Portland, Oregon, on Saturday, consumed all the buildings on twenty blocks. The total loss is estimated at over $1,000-000, and the insurance is only about $300,000.

—Four fatal cases at Dayton, Ohio, from cholera one from cholera morbus and three from cholera infantum, are reported as having occurred at Dayton and that vicinity within the past week.

—A letter from Fort Black, Texas, says that the foray of the Indians are increasing to an alarming extent, and that scarcely a day passes but the body of some isolated frontiersman is found. Stock and horses, also, are frequently run off from seemingly secure settlements. The latter says that these things happen notwithstanding the cavalry are scouring the country.

—The steamer Howell struck a snag in the Ohio river a few days since and sunk in five minutes, drowning a number of passengers. A Mrs. King and two little daughters were lost. Sometime after the boat sank and the surviving passengers were rescued and landed safely, wreckers went to work to recover the dead bodies and on a mattress, floating about in the cabin, was one of these little girls fast asleep.

—During the past two days the telegraph has reported no less then eight cases of suicide, and there is no knowing how many others there have been that have not been telegraphed. Again we ask, what is the matter with people? They periodically kill themselves or each other of late years, with a degree of recklessness that is astounding. Is life more burdensome or death more desirable than formerly—or what is the explanation?

—Lieutenant General Sheridan, in forwarding his report to General Sherman, says: The Indians who depredate in the Mud river valley belong to the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes about Fort Fetterman, who were recently represented in the peace council at the Red Cloud Agency, and Lieutenant Colonel Brackett reports from camp Starbaugh, W. T., that the Indians made an attack on the settlement of old Camp Brown on the 28th of July, and killed Mrs. Richards and Miss Hall. First Lieutenant Whalan, with company B, 2d calvary, has gone in pursuit of the murderers.

—The ravages of the cholera are increasing, seeming to be confined, however, to particular localities. Accounts received from Burmingham Ala., represent a terrible state of affairs at that place. It is said that healthy men are suddenly attacked by the destroyer while walking in the streets, and fall down and expire unattended. Those not already smitten are afraid to go near the sufferers. Out of a population of 5,000, only 500 people have not deserted their homes, and ten funerals have sometimes occurred in a day. One fatal case of the epidemic is reported from the Ohio Penitentiary at Columbus. At Poplar Bluff, Mo., thirty deaths have occurred from this cause out of a population of 800. Two fatal and two very dangerous cases are reported at Evansville, Ind. Jonesboro, Tenn., has been almost deserted by its inhabitants, owing to the presence of the scourge. Up to date thirteen deaths from cholera have occurred at Indianapolis. This statement of facts should not be allowed to pass unheeded.

—The first of July there was a sinking in of the earth near Kickapoo station, on the Missouri Pacific Railroad, a few miles south of Atchison, the earthquake, or whatever it might be called, taking place just after the mail train had passed the locality, and letting the railroad track down several feet for a distance of about 300 yards. A new track was laid several feet from the site of the old one, and trains have been running regularly; but the ground has continued to sink deeper and deeper, and the space becomes wider and wider, so that the railroad track is again in danger. The "sink" is about 10 yards wide and 300 yards long, and the surface of the earth has sunk about 30 feet since the 8th instant. It is about 20 yards from the river's edge, and can be accounted for in no other way than by an earthquake, although the continual sinking is another remarkable feature. Although the sink occurred on the edge of the bluff, there is no indication of anything like a landslide, the ground between the sink and the river maintaining its usual appearance.

ABROAD.

—The Carlists at Prats De Llusanes are divided into three corps, Don Alfonso commanding.

—A fleet of Italian war vessels has been ordered to proceed to Cartagenia, to protect the Italian subjects there, and to co-operate with other foreign vessels in whatever measures may be deemed necessary.

—A dreadful accident occurred August 2nd on the Northwestern Railway, near Wigan, Lancashire, to the Scotch tourist express train from London. Twelve persons were instantly killed, and thirty wounded. Among the killed is Sir John Anson. Many of the injured will die.

—Victor Emanuel has been greatly disquieted by the clamors of the French priests against his treatment of the Papal See. They are exciting an agitation, which is infecting the whole of clerical Europe. If they are not suppressed he will turn for relief to Prussia, which shows the clerics no quarter, and ally his fortunes with hers. This, he significantly reminds MacMahon, might result in losses of men, money, and territory more terrible than those of 1870

—As the Established Church of England continues to decline imperceptibly, perhaps, but steadily, the Catholic religion is slowly gaining strength in that country. Many of the most influential noblemen of that realm are its earnest and liberal supporters. It is suggestive, therefore to note that 100 Jesuites, expelled from Germany have located in Lancashire, on a piece of property denoted for that purpose by a wealthy English gentleman. However distasteful their presence may be, the English Government will certainly not dare to attempt their expulsion.

Conference Minutes.

The special meeting of the annual conference called was held at Iron Hill. The conference was called to order on Sunday, July 13, at 2 o'clock P. M., the officers of the annual conference being absent. C. W. Pitcher was appointed chairman pro tem, and W. R. Chandler secretary pro tem.

Ministers present—M. Chandler, J. Sade, C. W. Pitcher, G. W. Woodard, E. Cooly.

It was moved and carried, that the Iron Hill District and Deep Creek District be consolidated into one, that of Delmar District, the officers elect of Deep Creek District to serve as officers their time of election.

It was then voted that C. W. Pitcher and John Sade be ordained, but there not being a sufficient number of ordained elders present it was postponed until the annual conference.

Adjourned sine die.

W. R. CHANDLER, Sec'y. pro tem.

Report of Tent Meeting.

MONDOVI, Wisconsin.

This meeting commenced July 10. It was not largely attended, at least by those that came under the canvas, the audience outside sometimes equalled them inside, especially evenings. The ministers of the different churches stayed away, or at least did not come under the canvas. Yet the interest continued to increase from the beginning: two were converted, many tracts given away, one subscriber for paper obtained, and a number of requests for us to remain with them a week longer; so that, all things considered, it was a success. We find in some places that the different forms of religion are at a discount, and the chances of getting a hearing under the circumstances are generally good, but it was not so here; the different orders were so near alike in numbers, the most of them walked very orderly. I tried to form a Christian acquaintance with the ministers, but it seemed like a rope of sand.

Quarterly Meeting Report.

The second meeting of the Iron Hill District was held with the church at Iron Hill, commencing Friday, July 11. Preaching by G. W. Woodard. Two arose for prayers.

Saturday, 2 P. M., after prayer being offered by various brethren, the conference was called to order, and Eld. C. W. Pitcher appointed chairman pro tem, and W. R. Chandler, secretary.

Ministers present—C. W. Pitcher, E. Cooly, G. W. Woodard, J. Sade, M. Chandler.

Report of churches—Br. J. Binn reported the church at Iron Hill very much run down, there being only ten live members out of twenty-six; no prayer meetings. Preaching once in two weeks by Rev. P. S. Burch. Br. E. Cooly reported thirteen live members in the church at Brandon Four Corners.

A committee consisting of four was appointed to confer with the different churches around Iron Hill, to see if they cannot be consolidated into one. The committee were E. Cooly, Brandon Four Corners; J. Sade, Richland Creek; J. Roush, Esgate Church, J. Binn, Iron Hill. Adjourned.

Preaching Saturday evening by C. W. Pitcher; at 9 A. M. on Sunday love feast; 11 A. M. preaching by M. Chandler; 2 P. M. preaching by C. W. Pitcher; evening preaching by J. Sade.

Report of Tent Meeting No. 1.

This meeting did not commence the day appointed, viz.: July 3, the friends not knowing what was needed. However, on the 4th we reared the canvas tabernacle, and held service at 5:30, and also in the evening. The congregation was very small, and, I may say, that the audience was small throughout the meeting; but all who came were respectful and attentive. The best of order prevailed. There were some local causes for this.

1. Some that were much interested and prompt in attending the meeting last winter were sick.

2. There was a Sunday-school pic-nic got up for that day; this attracted the young minds generally.

3. There was a ball on the evening of the 4th; this attracted the pleasure-seeking class.

4. The railroad has just been located in that section, and the contractors had just begun operations. All these combined influences, added to the very low state of godliness in the place, the meeting was not as successful as I had expected; yet we think some seed was sown that we pray may be seen in the day of judgment. However, we should have stronger confidence if we could have obtained one subscriber for THE TIMES or Crisis, for I find by experience that two cases out of three, where they are induced to read on this subject, there follows a permanent interest.

Brethren in the ministry, and all others interested in the good cause, let us try to introduce this moral power into as many families as possible. Tracts and preaching will instruct, but the weekly visits of the paper will water and will soon become a household necessity. I had the assistance of Br. G. [illegible]urner. He is very agreeable, and I love [illegible] with him.

To the Editor and Correspondents: I join you in the great war upon Babylon and her daughters. Her citadel of immorality must fall before men will perceive how it is that they are justified by faith and saved by grace. Success to the rider of the white horse, (Rev. 6: 2.)

Your paper is unsurpassed in logic and literary finish.

From Sr. A. Smith.

Sr. M. A. Tibbets sent me your paper during the spring; my time ran out some time since, but I do not remember exactly when. Being anxious to read it, I have continued taking it from the office. I thought by this time I could send the money, but having been sick for more than a year, circumstances will not admit of my sending it now. I think I can send it about the first of September.

[Sr. Tibbets acted on the right principle; let others imitate her example in inducing others to try the paper a few months, that they may subscribe.—ED.]

From Elder Robert H. Scott, Bridgeport, Ind.

I commenced a series of meetings here the last part of June which resulted in five additions to the church, four by profession; praise the Lord, who blessed and gave power. The prejudices of the people have been greatly removed. May the Lord enable them to receive the truth in the love of the same, before Jesus comes to reward his saints.

After one week I was taken sick at Eld. John M. Cory's, and through their kind hospitality every thing was done for me that dear brethren could do. O, the love of true Christians, it is like Jesus in action. Our dear friends would not receive any thing in the way of reward, may the Lord reward them when he comes to reign.

Although this earth groans under the curse and evil men wax worse and worse, yet we, brethren, are looking for new heavens and a new earth. Blessed hope; let us work on a little longer.

From D. O. Amos, Ripon, Kas.

Perhaps some of the brethren in Kansas and other places would like to hear of the prosperity of the tent and the work connected with it. There is a great work here to be done; the field is large and the time is short; soon the angels sent out by the Great Master will thrust in the sickle, and the earth will be reaped. Who then will be saved? May we all do our part in making ready a people for his coming.

Pray for us, dear ones of like precious faith, that this great work may go on until many shall be brought into the marvelous light of the gospel. I can but weep as did the Savior over Jerusalem, when I see the heedlessness of the people, who seem to be given over to darkness. Thank the Lord some will hear. The Lord has blessed our short labor with the tent. We had a blessed time at Jacksonville. Two went forward in baptism, and on Sabbath eve we had a sweet season in communion, some forty or fifty partook of the broken bread in memory of Christ. Next we pitched the tent in Chetopee. Prejudice was great, but attendance was good. Two were baptized and a church of eight souls was organized. The administration of the Lord's supper was a solemn season long to be remembered. Br. Dunbar from Bero was down with a part of his family on Sunday. We parted with them at the water's edge. The Lord bless the family for their kindness and the great work they have done for truth. We came to Ripon yesterday, July 21, held a meeting last evening. We expect a good work here. Brethren pray for us.

From Hannah Prosser, Asper, Livingston Co., Mo.

Dear brethren and sisters in Christ: It is with great interest that I read your letters from time to time, and rejoice that God's truth is advancing. Oh, how much we need faithful ministers in our vicinity to proclaim the good tidings, and to arouse a sleeping church and an ungodly world to believe the Bible and obey its teachings. There are but few here that believe the truth, yet we are doing what we can to get our friends to examine the Bible and see whether these things are so. We feel the responsibility that rests upon us as believers and know that if we do not let our light shine that ere long Jesus will come and we shall be among the number that have not on the wedding garment. Oh, how many times when the cares of life and the temptations of the world surround do we long to see our Savior's coming. We long to be free from sin and sorrow and stand redeemed on the glorified earth. We long to listen to the songs of those that have long been silent in death, and we want to see those that have died in the faith through all generations. We expect to be among the number that "sing on that beautiful shore and roam o'er the beautiful plains of Eden," through all "eternity." What a blessed hope is ours. How it cheers the heart through all trials and bids us go on fearless of all that can oppose. Brethren, pray for us that we may be faithful over the few things, that God has given us, and meet you all in the better land. Should any of our brethren ever come this way we would gladly welcome you to our homes.

From Anna Smith, Kent, Ind.

Through the kindness of friends, it has been my privilege to read your excellent paper. It has been my desire for some time, to communicate a few words of encouragement. Having been taught from infancy to take the Bible alone for my guide, any light coming from its blessed pages was joyfully received. At the age of eleven, while hearing our beloved Eld. Goodwin, the thought crossed my mind, "If I should die, am I prepared?" When the invitation was given it seemed to me the proper time, and, making the good confession, was soon afterward buried with my Lord in baptism; blessed type of a buried and risen Lord. How few seem to see the beauty in this emblematic ordinance. We can scarcely realize the greatness of the effect caused by Christians determining to take nothing but the Holy Book. And of course, there is a tendency to feel that in so doing we were entirely rid of error. But splendid as our law book is, there are very few who really know what it contains; and alas! how few are trying to learn. Let us cry aloud, and if possible awake at least a few slumbering souls. The great, first principles have surely been seen by many, yet there are thousands who have no more idea what the Bible teaches concerning coming unto Christ, than a Hindoo, and while we long and pray for light concerning our future home, and all the beautiful topics so pleasant to the Christian, we must be careful not to forget the ones who know not how they may become heirs of his glory. Truly, the worldly mind knows nothing of the sweetness that dwells in the heart of the believer. May it be our happy lot to sit with Mary at the Master's feet, and listen to that voice of love. Nothing impure shall enter there! Even our inmost thoughts must be purified. Let us purify our souls by obeying the truth.

From Eld. J. C. Smith, Kansas.

The Lord is blessing abundantly, and all things are working together for good.

We have been holding tent meetings since July 5, and will continue over to-morrow. Then we will go to Chetopah, Labette Co., where we hold meetings a week or more; and from there, the Lord willing, we go to Rippon, a place west of Chetopee, toward Independence. Br. Bliss has arrived to help, also Br. and Sr. Clark. Our hearts were made glad by their arrival. Their hearts are in the work, and they are willing to make a sacrifice for Jesus and his truth. Br. Bliss has been doing a good work in the northern part of this state, and a great door for usefulness has been opened. Br. and Sr. Clark left home some eight weeks ago and started out, as did Abraham, not knowing whither they should go: and the Lord has greatly blest their labors. Infidels, two in one place, came out and gave up their infidel works, and they had some strong ones, but they are now rejoicing in the religion of Jesus Christ. The dark side of the picture has become to them bright as the noonday sun. Their darkness has been turned to light, and how great the light. Old things are passed away, and all things become new. And so it is in this place: the theory of the day has become to them as an idle tale. It has made many infidels. But this blessed Bible theory opens their eyes, and so they have become stirred up wonderfully. One man that has been a Roman Catholic has learned a better way, and found peace in Jesus: came out to our first meeting: we spoke on the gospel of the kingdom. It looked plain to him. The next eve we spoke on the saint's inheritance. After meeting he came up and grasped my hand, saying, "I can see light through." That is as Abraham, by faith he could see over into the kingdom, the "new earth." After meeting one night, a goodly number of young men came forward to ask questions, desiring reading matter. O, the work is great, and the Lord only is sufficient for these things. Wherever we go the desire is for us to come back and hold more meetings. Br. and Sr. Clark say they never saw such a harvest field. Brothers and sisters at the east and west, will you not lend a helping hand in this great work. We do pray that means may be provided for the advancement of our missionary tent into new places. Br. and Sr. Clark ought to be supported; also Br. Bliss. And we do need books and tracts to scatter among the people. You that have works laid by, will you not please forward to J. C. Smith, Arvonia, Osage Co., Kansas? We do hope this call will be attended to.

O, that the Lord may open hearts, and means may be sent to the Society that tracts may be printed to scatter over this broad western field. O, for big hearts and noble actions now, and ever, till Jesus comes. Pray for me that I may have health and strength, and wisdom from on high.

From D. D. and S. M. Reed, Silverton, Marion County, Oregon.

Thinking the scattered saints might be glad to hear of our success in our mission in Oregon, I will drop a few lines. We have now been in the State six weeks, and have held meetings at five different places; holding from two to eight meetings in a place. The interest has been great in all the places that we have visited. On our first entering into the State, we visited the classes raised up and formed by our beloved Br. Norton, who came to this state a year ago last spring, from Santa Clara, he being our first convert to the truth on this coast. His labors have been greatly blessed in this State. A goodly number of faithful, devoted Christians have been gathered together, waiting for the return of the King. We enjoyed blessed seasons with them. On leaving those dear saints, who live so peacefully and happy in the mountains, we came out to Hillsboro, situate on the Zualaton Plains, a county seat. There we held meetings for ten days, and a great interest was awakened in the minds of the people, and they searched the Scriptures to see if these things were so. Br. Norton was with us at this place, and we left him there to carry on the work. We next stopped at Cornelius and gave two sermons, and would have stopped longer had there been a convenient place to hold meetings, as there was a good ear to hear.

Our next meeting was at Lafayette, Yamhill County, the county seat. A very pleasant town, and very kind and friendly people, who received us gladly; they listened with good attention and increasing interest to the truths we brought. We held eight meetings there, preaching the word faithfully, and kept back nothing that was profitable unto them. The resident minister, a Methodist, took up the subject of immortality on Sunday morning, and Br. Wilson attended and took notes and reviewed it. All the scriptural arguments that he brought he took up, which were but few, it being mostly assertions and assumptions. He was very nervous and excited in his discourse, coming out of the desk and calling us "deceivers," "Mormons," "blind leaders of the blind," "unconverted," etc. His spirit was so bad that it was apparent to all, and it only worked for the good of the cause of truth; a goodly number, became clear and settled, on all the great doctrinal truths of the Bible. Some that were strong infidels accepted the Bible and God, its author, when they saw the beauty and harmony of the scriptures, and the lovely character of God our Heavenly Father.

A powerful work was wrought there, such as we have not seen for years. Truly, there is power in the truth yet, to move the people and shake the sandy foundations of human theology and vain traditions of men. We left the dear friends with many regrets, and strong desires for our speedy return.

We are now at Silverton, Marion County, in the midst of a tedious rain storm. We are making arrangements to commence meetings in a hall, as soon as the weather will permit. There are no ministers or meetings in this place. We are praying for the word of God to take effect here and move the people. God has been with us in great power thus far on this mission, and blessed the preaching of his word wonderfully. The fields are truly white in this State, and laborers few; an open ear to hear everywhere, with great interest and attention. We have invitations from all directions—more than we can fill, as our time is limited, and the health of Br. Wilson (who is with us) is poor, and we have to move and work as we are able. But we pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers into this field. There are good people here who are perishing for the word of life, and who would receive it if brought to them. The Lord hear their prayers, and send men to this State—men of God, who are not afraid to suffer, and travel, and labor, with but little remuneration, for the truth's sake. The Lord is soon coming, and what is done must be done quickly. Pray for us. Yours in mission work.

Believing and Speaking.

It is pleasant traveling on the smooth path of orthodoxy, undisturbed by any doubt concerning the exact harmony of the received faith, in all its parts, with the teachings of "men who spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." The ancestral belief is a sacred thing, a highly prized heirloom of the family: you believe as, and because, your fathers did, and are not troubled with the inquisitiveness of those earnest souls that question and cross question every proposition submitted for their adoption, that they may be perfectly satisfied of its divinity before they make it their own. It is so comfortable to accept whatever the church teaches without the toil of personal investigation. It saves time, and head aches, and money, and reading, and, above all, the slightest suspicion of that dreadful thing, "heresy." It shields you from being evil spoken of by sharp tongues—the bitter persecution that falls to the lot of the people who are so impudent as to think for themselves. It protects you from the vexation of being shunned in the streets, and from the fear of inability—in consequence of diminished income—to pay your way like a man of high Christian principle, and to support the family that God has graciously given you. You escape all this, and a great many other disagreeable things,—with which men who dare all for truth are familiar, —by traveling in the smooth path of orthodoxy, undisturbed by doubt concerning its identity with the King's highway that leads to glory, honor, and immortality. You stand well with the brotherhood, and are in all respects "a safe man," worthy of the esteem and reward that flow through the proper channels to men who hold the faith as it is in popular theology.

Well, there can be no doubt that most of us would like to live such a quiet life; for there are very few men who are such stormy petrels that they are never at peace except when fighting, never at rest unless reposing in the center of a hurricane. We would like—there is no doubt of it—green fields, sweet flowers, beautiful scenery, choice friends, a sufficient income, constant health, and a safe path to heaven ready made to our feet,—if, indeed, we must leave a world so beautiful, with associations and circumstances that seem to press us to their heart, saying, "Stay!" The world has exquisite attractions, the work of the glorious Creator, and we see no reason why these should not be "sought out of them that have pleasure therein." Admiration of the beautiful in nature and profound loyalty to him who bade the mountains rise, made a channel for the mighty rivers, and adorned the lily of the valley with a vesture surpassing that of Solomon the Splendid, are not incompatible ideas. It is miserable ignorance of the happy worship in which God would have his human creatures engage that prescribes physical pain and privation, and a turning away with indifference from the works of his hands, as acceptable to him. The time will surely come when this delusion will perish, with all other dismal mistakes that have blocked up the passage to the temple, making it a place of gloom, and its loving Creator a being to be shunned. When the paradise of the Second Adam is co-extensive with the world, pestential swamps and arid deserts being clothed with fertility and beauty, and garlanded with countless millions of flowers of every hue that the infinite resources of the Great Husbandman can devise, Flora will no longer be a heathen deity, but a gentle handmaid amongst a thousand others, and all nature shall praise God through the lips of sanctified men. Everything is destined to be "holiness to the Lord." Thanks be to God for the information! May he hasten the day!

But in the meantime it is worth while asking whether the pleasant path is, after all, the most honorable:—whether the unquestioning acceptance of traditional theology is the best way to produce those strong men whose teaching and example tend to purify the church and benefit the world; and who, in consequence, though branded as heretics in their own generation, are regarded in a later age as heaven-sent champions of truth. Neither in church nor state are things quite right just yet. In the region of politics men are not disposed to accept tor, although, in fact, there are ional circumstances when this be done with national advantage. e region of religion men are too to believe scholastic dogmatism, h the result has always proved to the church. What, then, actical conclusion? Just this: h is infinitely precious, and n who love truth, esteeming it rubies and above all possible or sible earthly advantages, should covet "the smooth path," but "the ing's highway of holiness;" should not seek to please their fellow creatures, but their God; should deem all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus the Lord. The sacrifice of ease, or peace, or denominational honor, or property, or of all together, is, of course, a serious thing; but the recovery of some lost truth whose brilliance sheds lustre on the entire revelation of heaven is an ample compensation for the temporary trouble occasioned by the sacrifice. The devout and the thoughtful will seize the recovered gem with gratitude and joy, will thank God for it, and will remember in their prayers the brother whose labor dug it out of the rubbish which centuries of tradition had heaped before the beautiful gate of the temple. The times that are passing over the church and the world demand men of high Christian principle and unbending Christian decision, who, for Christ's sake, will bring everything to the severe test of divine revelation, with settled determination to accept and abide by the consequences, be they what they may; and when the Lord returns to establish his glorious kingdom,—an event which comes apace to the joy of his waiting saints,—those who have been faithful to him will have no reason to regret the sacrifices they made or the afflictions they have endured for his name.

Information reaches us from many places at home and in our splendid colonies that the Platonic dogma of the immortality of the soul, out of which grew the inconceivable horror of eternal torment, is losing its grasp upon the minds of men who have brought it to the sure test of the Holy Scriptures. This is a necessary consequence; for revelation knows nothing of immortality except as the exclusive possession of God, and a wonderful "gift" to those who are his children by redemption in Christ Jesus. But whilst we quite understand, by personal experience, how an earnest examination of the divine word must result in the abandonment of the twin falsehoods of natural immortality and eternal woe, we do not understand how good men who have been graciously emancipated from the thraldom of these pernicious errors can accept the deliverance and yet keep silent respecting it. It is not enough to cease preaching the dread lie that countless millions of human souls will be kept alive for ever by the omnipotent God amidst the torments of fire, without the faintest possibility of either deliverance or destruction. Within the last few years many ministers in England have done this; but we affectionately appeal to them to ask their consciences if this is enough. Are they satisfied with themselves? They have ceased to do evil, but let them also learn to do well. Of all evil things, speaking lies in the name of the Lord seems the chief. This they no longer do; but O, surely loyalty to truth and gratitude to God, not to speak of love to their fellow men, should induce them to wax eloquent on the great gospel announcement, the most inspiring of all themes,—Eternal life only in Christ. The negative is well, so far as it goes; but here is a case in which every consideration vehemently demands the positive—a positive declaration of the nature of man—mortal; a positive proclamation of the character of God—love; a positive announcement of the meaning of redemption—life. We beseech our brethren who have had mental manliness enough to shake off the fetters of tradition for their own liberty and comfort, to come forward with Christian manliness as the avowed advocates of true theology, for the liberty and comfort of others. We never ask men to do what we shrink from doing ourselves; and now that we have for a number of years quietly borne the reproach for the sake of truth, and looked to our Father for shelter while the storm was raging, we feel almost as if we had acquired a moral right to say to dear brethren who think with us, "SPEAK WITH US."—To be concluded in our next.

Sermon by Dr. Duryea,

AT THE OPENING OF CHALMER'S CHURCH, IN MONTREAL, CANADA.

The services were conducted by Dr. Duryea, of New York, who took as his text the 4th verse of the 27th Psalm: "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple."

He said few events in the history of a faithful follower of Christ have more power on his mind than the opening of a new temple. When David uttered the words of the text he was in trouble, and was looking for rest, safety and peace, and his mind fixed itself on the tabernacle of God as the place where these things were to be found. This was before the temple of Solomon was built, and the tabernacle was simply the place where God manifested himself to the people. Wherever God manifested himself was a temple, therefore we may consider the history of God's temple as the history of his manifested presence. Sometimes we cannot realize that God continually looks down upon us, but when we can, then and only then can we recognize the grandeur and nobleness of our existence. God first manifested himself in the Garden of Eden, and on the very day of the expulsion of our first parents he gave Eve that name because she should be the mother of all living. His presence from this time was betokened by a cherubim or shekinah, and around it always centered his people. As their love for decoration increased it was developed on the altars, till the altar of God was the most beautiful thing on earth. When Solomon built a house of worship every possible means was used to beautify it, so that Jerusalem was the joy of the whole earth, and the temple was the joy of Jerusalem. After the completion of the temple the visible manifestations of God's presence were withdrawn; they were not visible to the eye, but to the mind. Then they were completely withdrawn and the prophets supplied their place. Then the prophets and visible manifestations were withdrawn, and Christ, the Son of God, was manifested in all his glory, breathing forth the character and will of God, his living, speaking presence. Then Christ's manifestation on earth was withdrawn from earth, but the promise came—"When two or three are gathered in my name there will I be also." If this be true, how can I dwell in the temple of our God? Christ is present with believers, and is peculiarily present with the fellowhip of believers.

Two things characterize the service of God in his house: First, preaching Christ, setting him forth in his completeness and oneness, in his living beauty, and divine presence and power, the living Christ. The artist takes the clay, moulds it, and fashions it so as to represent every muscle, every vein, every distinguishing part of the model, till it almost lives and breathes. The clay is the gospel: it must be worked up, showing in all its perfectness, color and beauty the model Christ. What an artist the preacher must be who can do this! What an important mission is his. It should be the desire of the audience who come, to hear new beauties of the character of Christ. Some come for mental stimulus, some to have their feelings stimulated; if the minister has fire, beautiful ideas, etc., in his sermon, they are delighted. The human heart is like a harp and the player thereon, and they set themselves before him that his playing may fill them with thrillings of pleasure and cause them to admire the band that does it. This is not right: when the preacher is struggling to set forth the beauty of Christ you must put your whole mind to understand and take the full meaning of the description. It is true you need to be taught what is right and what wrong; but the ability to do right comes from the study of the character of Jesus; when you know Christ, and when you are familiar with his character and obtain fellowship with him, by that fellowship you will be quickened with his holiness. The principles of character are in the affections. When the affections are with Christ, the character will be Christ-like. Submit yourself to the leading of the Spirit, and it will lead you to a full conception of Christ, and he will stand complete before you; when you view Christ in meditation select that phase of life most suited to your circumstances; but it must be Christ speaking, acting or suffering. Are you burdened with cares? Look at the woman dropping her tears on his feet and wiping the stains away with her flowing hair. Are you suffering, weak and weary? go to the cross, stand by it, and contemplate Christ there. If at the side of death, go to the tomb, contemplate Christ there; or, if you are shaken by the thought of death, stand by him as he cries, "Into thy hand, Father, I commend my spirit." This is walking with Christ, living with him. Thank God for the power he has given us to contemplate him; Jesus of Nazareth is ours, the past is present, the past is ours, everything belongs to us. When you have contemplated Jesus in his entirety and know him you will know what to do in any emergency.

You know what will please him, having sympathy with Christ. You will shrink from unrighteousness as a nerve from the blade without asking why. No man can be Christ-like and not sacrifice much for him. The stillborn infant does not breathe, but the quick born infant must breathe; it is its nature. We must begin by contemplating our Lord, and surrendering ourselves to his power; he moulds us to his life, and then everything we do shall be for him, and it shall be "not I, but Christ in me." Then is it not grand to contemplate Christ, and is it not a grand thing to build a church, where Christ will be manifested and his character depicted?—N. Y. Daily Witness.

An Apt Reply.

A German paper contains a reply from a clergyman who was traveling, and who stopped at a hotel much frequented by what are termed "drummers." The host not being used to having a clergyman at his table, looked at him with surprise; the clerks used all their artillery of wit upon him, with out eliciting a remark in self defence The worthy clergyman ate his dinner quietly, apparently without observing the gibes and sneers of his neighbors. One of them at last, in despair at his forbearance, said to him:

Well, I wonder at your patience! Have you not heard all that has been said against you?"

"O yes but I am used to it. Do you not know who I am?"

"No, sir." Well, I will inform you. I am chaplain of a lunatic asylum such remarks have no effect upon me."

A CHEERFUL temper is a perpetual hymn to the divinity.

Our Young Folks.

They Didn't Think.

Once a trap was baited
With a piece of cheese;
It tickled so a little mouse,
It almost made him sneeze.
An old rat said, "There's danger,
Be careful where you go!"
"Nonsense!" said the other,
"I don't think you know!"
So he walked in boldly—
Nobody in sight;
First he took a nibble,
Then he took a bite;
Close the trap together
Snapped as quick as wink;
Catching mousy fast there,
'Cause he didn't think.

Once a little turkey,
Fond of her own way,
Wouldn't ask the older ones
Where to go or stay!
She said, "I'm not a baby,
Here I am half-grown;
Surely I am big enough
To run about alone!"
Off she went, but somebody
Hiding saw her pass;
Soon like snow her feathers
Covered all the grass.
So she made a supper
For a sly young mink,
'Cause she was so headstrong
That she wouldn't think.

Once there was a robin
Lived outside the door,
Who wanted to go inside
And hop upon the floor.
"Oh, no," said the mother,
"You must stay with me;
Little birds are safest
Sitting in a tree.
"I don't care," said robin,
And gave his tail a fling,
"I don't think the old folks Know quite everything."
Down he flew, and kittie seized him
Before he'd time to blink;
"Oh," he cried, "I'm sorry
But I didn't think."

Now, my little children,
You who read this song,
Don't you see what trouble
Comes of thinking wrong?
And can't you take a warning
From their dreadful fate,
Who began their thinking
When it was too late?
Don't think there's always safety
Where no danger shows;
Don't suppose you know more
Than anybody knows;
But when you're warned of ruin,
Pause upon the brink,
And don't go under headlong
'Cause you didn't think.

What the Wind Says.

"Do you know what the cold wind says, grandpa?" asked a little child at an old merchant's knee.

"No, puss; what does it?" he answered, stroking her fair hair.

"'Remember the poor,' grandpa. When it comes down the chimney, it roars, 'Remember the poor;' when it puts its great mouth to the key-hole, it whistles, 'Remember the poor;' when it strides through a crack in the door, it whispers it; and grandpa, when it blows your beautiful silver hair about in the street, and you shiver, and button up your coat, does it not get at your ear, and say so, too, 'in a still, small voice,' grandpa?"

"Why, what does the child mean?" cried grandpa, who, I am afraid, had been used to shut his heart against such words. "You want a new muff and tippet, I reckon. A pretty way to get them of your old grandfather!"

"No, grandpa," said the child earnestly, shaking her head, "no, it's the no-muff-and-tippet children I'm thinking of. My mother always remembers them; and so do I try to."

After the next storm, the old merchant sent many dollars to the treasurer of a relief society, and said, "call for more when you want it."

The treasurer started with surprise; for it was the first time he had ever collected more than a few dollars from him; and those, he thought came grudgingly.

"Why," said the rich merchant, afterward, "I could never get rid of that child's words; they stuck to me like glue."

"And a little child shall lead them," says the Scripture. How many a cold heart has melted, and a close heart opened, by the simple earnestness and suggestive words of a child.—Sel.

A Beautiful Prayer.

We hope many little children will learn the following beautiful prayer:

Father, now the day is past,
On thy child this blessing cast:
Near my pillow, hand in hand,
Keep thy guardian angel-band;
And throughout the darkling night
Bless me with a cheerful light;
Let me rise at morn again,
Free from every thought of pain;
Pressing through life's thorny way,
Keep me, Father, day by day!

Obituary.

ANNIS.—Died at Milroy, Ills., July 16, 1873, Harvey H. Annis, in his 70th year.

He had been afflicted with epileptic fits for twenty-three years, and from which he died. Words of comfort by Br. M. H. Goff, from Hebrews 10: 28.

LEAH ANNIS.

WINCHELL.—Died, at Stellwell, LaPorte Co., Ind., July 24, 1873, Sister Melissa Winchell, wife of Br. N. I. Winchell.

Sr. Winchell was in the fiftieth year of her age. By her death Br. W. is deprived of an affectionate companion, a son and daughter of a true and faithful mother, an aged mother of a dutiful daughter, and the church of one of its purest members. She died in full hope of his coming and kingdom.

We laid her away to sleep, but not forever. May the Lord comfort the hearts of her friends by his Spirit and grace.

Funeral attended by the writer. D. MATHEWSON.

HARRIS.—Died, at Seeleyburg, Wis., July 5, 1873, caused by the bursting of a cannon on July 4th, Lonson Harris, son of Samuel and Persis Harris. Aged, 19 years.

Lonson leaves a large circle of friends to mourn his loss.

Words of comfort from Job 14: 14.

ANSON BROWN.

NORRIS.—Fell asleep in Jesus, May 20, 1873, Sister Almyra, daughter of John Norris, of Weaster Creek, Wis. Aged, 23 years.

Sister Almyra leaves a large circle of friends, but they mourn not as those who have no hope, for if faithful they expect to meet her again when Jesus comes to gather the loved ones home.

Words of comfort from 1 Cor. 15: 22, by

ANSON BROWN.

Book Notices, Etc.

HISTORY OF THE SECOND ADVENT MESSAGE.—The rise, progress and known results of the proclamation now called 'Second Adventism,' or, properly, the message of the immediate coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrines and messages associated with it; the misguided zeal of some of its friends, errors imbibed and taught, the efforts, bad logic, and arguments of honest opponents to overthrow it; the persecution, strategy, slander, and falsehoods of its enemies, and the wonderful success God has given it in overturning errors, and re-establishing the old fundamental truths of the Bible and primitive Christianity in the hearts of tens of thousands of Christians, sceptics, and infidels, is worthy of being published in a condensed historical form, though time should continue but a little longer.

Such a work is much needed. There are thousands now amongst us who know but little of our past views, experiences, contests, and victories; but little of the main principles which have been our guide and defense against errors old and new. There are thousands of others who are convicted of the truths which we teach, and who will be greatly benefitted by such a work, giving definite forms of doctrine, much valuable information, a large amount of Bible instruction on vital points, correcting many misconceptions, slanders, and false reports. Such a work will fall into the hands of many ministers, scholars, editors, and other religious readers, to benefit them, and glorify God by the spread of his truth, to awaken sinners to prepare for the judgment.

We propose to publish such a work by subscription, when one thousand subscribers are obtained.

We shall give the chief points of doctrines originally taught forty years ago and onward, by Advent proclaimers, in America, Europe, and Asia, with biographical sketches of the pioneers; also, historical sketches of authors and editors, books and papers, missions and doctrines now taught. We shall give, in their own language, the rich experiences and new views of many who have merged from the darkness of error and false traditions concerning the millennium, the nature of man, his state in death, and future rewards, into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel hope. We shall give in plates and diagrams the symbols and periods of Daniel and John, with dates of times fixed upon which have passed, and those yet future; also tables of some of the best chronologies of the Bible, with criticisms on Egyptian, Chinese, and other heathen chronologies.

We shall call to our aid several able writers, who are qualified for such a work, shall give specimen Sermons, Essays, Lectures, and condensed reports of debates which have been held by able men; reviews of some of our chief opponents' efforts, on life, death, immortality, future punishment, and rewards. The signs of our times, and the great awakening in all Christian lands, on the subject of our Lord's personal and speedy coming, will be clearly stated.

No money called for until the book is published. It will contain 600 octavo pages, on good paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price, $3.00. The first thousand subscribers shall have it delivered to them for $2.50 each. This we can better afford to do than to await sales at full price.

All ministers, and others who will secure subscribers, shall receive a suitable prize when the book is delivered. Address, I. C. WELLCOME,
Yarmouth, Maine.

Names of subscribers received at this office.

The Waiting Church.

H. BONAR.

The Church has waited long
  Her absent Lord to see,
And still in loneliness she waits,
  A friendless stranger she.
Age after age has gone,
  Sun after sun has set,
And still in weeds of widowhood
  She weeps a mourner yet.
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

Saint after saint on earth
  Has lived, and loved, and died,
And as they left us one by one,
  We laid them side by side;
We laid them down to sleep,
  But not in hope forlorn—
We laid them but to ripen there
  Till the last glorious morn.
Come, then, Lord Jesus come!

The serpent's broods increase,
  The powers of hell grow bold;
The conflict thickens, faith is low,
  And love is waxing cold.
How long, O Lord our God,
  Holy and true and good,
Wilt thou not judge thy suffering Church,
  Her sighs, and tears, and blood?
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

We long to hear thy voice,
  To see thee face to face,
To share thy crown and glory then
  As now we share thy grace.
Should not the loving Bride
  Her absent Bridegroom mourn?
Should she not wear the signs of grief
  Until her Sun return!
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

The whole creation groans,
  And waits to hear that voice
That will restore her comeliness,
  And make her wastes rejoice.
Come, Lord, and wipe away
  The curse, the sin, the stain,
And make this blighted world of ours
  Thine own fair world again.
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

The New Heaven and The New Earth.

(Rev. 21: 1–4, 9–12, 21, 25–27.)

REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D. D.

We have reached the concluding act in the great drama—"The things which shall be hereafter." The number of God's elect is accomplished; the bridal day of the Church Triumphant has at last arrived; the consummated bliss of Christ and his people. It is the clear shining after rain; the morning without clouds; "the darkness is past and the true light shineth." All the apocalyptic scenery regarding the Church Militant terminates with the previous chapter. All its fierce Armageddons are fought: the great assize is dissolved; the books are closed, the inquiry hushed, the wide moral gulf is fixed forever. The Evangelist is now represented standing like another Noah on the hights of Ararat, gazing on a renovated world. After passing through the crucible of its own latent fires, it has come forth, phœnix-like, from their ashes in new resurrection attire. On the occasion of the deluge, although a vast aqueous mass rolled over the surface, or part of the surface of the globe, submerging its hills and valleys, this did not involve the destruction of the planet. It rose rather from its water baptism clad in fresh loveliness and verdure. So, we have strong reason to believe, will it be in this second or last fiery baptism. The earth will be in a state of fusion;—the elements "melting with the fervent heat" (2 Pet. 3: 12):—the now imprisioned fires sweeping over its surface, charring its forests, and calcining its rocks. But though there will be displacement, dislocation, decomposition, there will be no annihilation;—these will be no more than igneous purifiers, from which it will come forth, new created,—attire in more than pristine beauty. Travellers, who have ascended Vesuvius, tell us, that some of the old lava-channels, which years ago poured down their molten streams of destruction, are now covered with luxuriant vine and purple clusters. So will it be on a vast, gigantic scale, with this world and its thousand volcanoes of living fire. Life and luxuriance well once more clothe its seamed and smitten sides. From that tremendous conflagration will emerge "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." One speciality alone is here noted in its altered physical aspect, that there will be "no more sea." These last fires have dried up the watery element—redeemed from blank those vast solitudes of ocean, which now often form a rampart, preventing the brotherhood of nations. This world's habitable platform being thus indefinitely widened and expanded, room will be made for all "the nations of the saved."

Say not these picturings of a renewed and renovated earth are too strange and incredible facts for human belief. They are not a whit more so than other Scriptural revelations dearest to our hopes and encircling our every thought of the future. Not more strange, surely, is the astounding truth that the body laid in the grave—resolved into its primeval clay—mouldering in insensate dust—is one day to rise exultant from the tomb, its pulses beating with immortality: not more strange, is the fact of the unsightly seed or grain, embedded in the ground, springing up in graceful and multiplied form;—or the dull, torpid, loathsome chrysalis, bursting its dark prison-house and soaring aloft in varied and brilliant hue;—not more strange or unaccountable are any of these, than that this earth, convulsed, shattered, disorganized—a wreck of matter—shall emerge from its grave, in holiday attire,—break from its chrysalis shell, radiant with beauty, "like the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

In the present chapter, we have brought before us, in succession, what the apostle saw and what he heard. In other words we have the picture, or what was presented to his eye: and the voice, or what was addressed to his ear.

In vision, John stands on the bare, naked platform of the new heavens and the new earth, over which we may imagine the morning stars are again singing together, and all the sons of God are shouting for joy. As he gazes—lo! a resplendent city, and one of gigantic proportions, with towers, walls, and gates—reminding him, at a glance, of his own loved Jerusalem—seems slowly and magnificently to descend from the upper heavens. At first, as if dazzled with the sight, and awed by the august voices which accompany and follow, he ventures on no description. By and by, however, in a subsequent verse he is conducted by an angel—a bright inhabitant from the spirit-world—to a great high mountain. From this height he obtains a more thorough survey. He marks that the city was four square;—that it has twelve gates, each gate sentinelled by angels;—that these gates are 'never shut at all by day, seeing that the city itself is bathed in a flood of everlasting brightness; "for there is no night there."

All the costliest material—gold and crystal, and every stone of priceless value, from the jasper to the amethyst, are employed as the earthly symbols and exponents of a glory which can not otherwise be translated into human language.

What unutterable thoughts must have thrilled through the beloved disciple's soul at that moment of all moments. For what was that moment? It was the fulfilment, in vision, of all his life-long prayers and longings. It was the birthday of the perfected Church. Amid the crowding reflections which rushed to his mind on the figurative descent of this new Jerusalem, his memory at seems the instant to travel back to the streets of the old Jerusalem. He thinks of the solemn words uttered by divine lips within view of its towers and temples—"Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" The new city suggests the emblem of the sacred parable. The Bridegroom has come. The last vision in the chapter preceding, was of the Judge seated on his throne. But now that enthroned Lord has left the judgment-hall for the coronation-hall. The day of ever lasting espousals has arrived. Make way for the Bride, the Lamb's wife!—the glorified church without spot or blemish or any such thing. "The new heaven and the new earth" are her royal bridal-cham- "I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband!"

Such then was the Picture which rose before the enraptured eye of the seer of Patmos.

Having sought briefly to describe what John's eyes saw, let us now turn to what his ears heard; let us turn from the Picture to the great Voice. And the evangelist spectator is not now forbidden, as on a former occasion, to "write." When the seven thunders uttered their voices, after the appearance of the rainbow-crowned angel as detailed in the tenth chapter, and when he was about to transcribe, a prohibition was addressed from heaven, "Write not." No such arrest is at present put upon his hand. It is the reverse. He receives the positive instruction in ver. 5 from the great Judge himself—"Write; for these words are true and faithful." God graciously authorizes him to pen the glorious revelation for the comfort of his church in every age. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

[CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

Christ's Sovereign Right Asserted.

"And the seventh angel sounded: and there followed loud voices in heaven, saying: The kingdom of the world is become our Lord's, and his Christ's; and he will reign forever and ever." (Rev. 11:15.) Bible Union Trans.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Christian Standard having inquired: "Does the New Testament warrant the expectation that the whole world will be converted to Christianity by the preaching of, or the influence of, the gospel? From 2 Thess. 1: 7–10, et al, I infer that when the Lord comes again he will find some 'who know not God, and who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.' How then can we expect all, i. e., the world, to be converted to Christianity by the gospel before the second coming of the Lord?" The editor replies:

"We are not warranted in expecting the subjugation of the whole world to Christ either before or after his second coming. That a time is to come when the 'kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ,' is evident; but that only indicates a predominance of Christian influence, so as to shape and sway the laws and conduct of these kingdoms. So, at least, we take it. But such a millennium as some people dream of is inconsistent with all just ideas of a probationary state, and at war with all human experience. Trial, temptation, conflict, adversity, must ever enter into the cup of Christian life, until the final redemption comes."

With the latter part of this answer we heartily agree, but that something greater is intended by the announcement in Rev. 11:15 than the Standard supposes, we think is obvious from the following considerations;

1. The trumpet under which the announcement is made that the sovereignty of this world has become Christ's is emphatically declared to be a "woe" trumpet. (Comp. ch. 3:13 with 11:14, 15.) A "woe" denotes a "great calamity," such as "a predominance of Christian influence" would not be, but such as will assuredly fall upon the "angry nations" when Christ, as the nobleman, returns from the far country, having received the kingdom. (Luke 19:11–27); when the wrath of God comes and he destroys them that destroy or corrupt the earth.

2. At "the last trump" the righteous "dead shall be raised" and the living saints be made immortal, according to 1 Cor. 15:50–54. The seventh trumpet of the Apocalypse is the last, and under it, in harmony with Paul, we hear it said: "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great, and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth." (v. 18.) Compare with 2 Tim. 4:1. The seventh trumpet, therefore, introduces the immortal state of the church and the judgment of the world.

3. The sovereignty which Christ obtains at the sounding of the seventh trumpet is to be endless; "He shall reign forever and ever." (See also Luke 1:31–33.) This cannot mean that worldly kingdoms are to be in perpetual existence and the principles of Christianity have a predominating but not absolute influence over them. When the will of God is "done in earth as it is in heaven"—as it will be when the kingdom of God is established—the mixed state of things now existing, and predicted to exist till the Lord comes, will have passed away. On the regenerated earth, holiness and happiness will be universal and perpetual. "So, at least, we take it;" and, thus taking it, we look not for the conversion of the world by the preaching of the gospel, but for the return of our Saviour to consummate the hope of his church and bring back the lost inheritance.—Advent Herald.

It was a storm that occasioned the discovery of the gold mines in India. Hath not a storm driven some to the discovery of the richer mines of God's love?

Leadership.

Many a noble army is defeated by being badly led; many a staunch vessel is wrecked by an incompetent pilot, and many a church, or cause, or society, suffers, languishes, and dies, in consequence of poor leadership. God gives knowledge and wisdom to his people. Each church or interest planted by Christ, has in it the material needful to ensure its success; but many are wasting and perishing to-day, because poor wise men must give place to rich fools; because grace must yield to greed, and because worldly policy must away to the exclusion of the Holy Spirit of God.

Churches are desolate to-day through the domineering of some head-strong man, too wise to learn, too ignorant to teach, too incompetent to direct, and too conceited and impudent to step aside and give place to others more competent. Important interests are ieopardized, simply that some great "I" may fill an office, or hold on to a position for which he is unfit. Nations perish because rulers will not learn wisdom, and run the vessel on the rocks, rather than admit their ignorance of the channel and call for a pilot's aid.

It is true, in the realms of "the world, the flesh, and the Devil," that an energetic man may lead downward, without much moral force; though even there a certain "honor among thieves" must exist in a marked degree, to command the regard of subordinates. But in the Church of Christ, and in the religious, moral and philanthropic enterprises of the day, all wickedness is positive weakness; and all dependence placed upon craft, policy, hypocrisy, deception and falsehood, will eventually end in ruin and confusion.

Men must be honest; men must tell the truth; men must stop deceiving and misrepresenting, and white-washing and white-lying; men must believe in God, if others are to have confidence in them; men must walk straight if they wish straight forward men to go with them. And any man who finds in his heart a disposition to show off, to appear what he is not, to put on a mask, or act a dishonest part, may be sure that God never made him for a leader in his work; and that if he crowds into such a position, sooner or later he will inevitably be found out, and kicked out, and sent to the rear, or sunk out of sight. A man who desires an office is usually unfit to fill it. An unfit man, who covets a high position, is only fixing himself for a tremendous fall. Men who are bound to "run things," are very likely to run them into the ground. Flattery, deception, soft-soap and sugar-plums, may make them popular for a time with babes and simpletons; but by and by the dullest eyes will open, the supply of sugar-plums will fail, and the duped and deceived victims will turn upon their deceivers with a fury as blind as their previous fellowship has been.

Give no quarter unto those vices which are of thine inward family, and having a root in thy temper, plead a right and property in thee. Examine well thy complexional inclination. Raise early batteries against those strongholds, built upon the rocks of nature, and make this a great part of the militia of thy life.

Not more strange, surely, is the astounding truth that the body laid in the grave—resolved into its primeval clay—mouldering in insensate dust—is one day to rise exultant from the tomb, its pulses beating with immortality: not more strange, is the fact of the unsightly seed or grain, embedded in the ground, springing up in graceful and multiplied form;—or the dull, torpid, loathsome chrysalis, bursting its dark prison-house and soaring aloft in varied and brilliant hue;—not more strange or unaccountable are any of these, than that this earth, convulsed, shattered, disorganized—a wreck of matter—shall emerge from its grave, in holiday attire,—break from its chrysalis shell, radiant with beauty, "like the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

In the present chapter, we have brought before us, in succession, what the apostle saw and what he heard. In other words we have the picture, or what was presented to his eye: and the voice, or what was addressed to his ear.

In vision, John stands on the bare, naked platform of the new heavens and the new earth, over which we may imagine the morning stars are again singing together, and all the sons of God are shouting for joy. As he gazes —lo! a resplendent city, and one of gigantic proportions, with towers, walls, and gates—reminding him, at a glance, of his own loved Jerusalem—seems slowly and magnificently to descend from the upper heavens. At first, as if dazzled with the sight, and awed by the august voices which accompany and follow, he ventures on no description. By and by, however, in a subsequent verse he is conducted by an angel—a bright inhabitant from the spirit-world—to a great high mountain. From this height he obtains a more thorough survey. He marks that the city was four square;—that it has twelve gates, each gate sentinelled by angels;—that these gates are never shut at all by day, seeing that the city itself is bathed in a flood of everlasting brightness; "for there is no night there."

All the costliest material—gold and crystal, and every stone of priceless value, from the jasper to the amethyst, are employed as the earthly symbols and exponents of a glory which can not otherwise be translated into human language.

What unutterable thoughts must have thrilled through the beloved disciple's soul at that moment of all moments. For what was that moment? It was the fulfilment, in vision, of all his life-long prayers and longings. It was the birthday of the perfected Church. Amid the crowding reflections which rushed to his mind on the figurative descent of this new Jerusalem, his memory at seems the instant to travel back to the streets of the old Jerusalem. He thinks of the solemn words uttered by divine lips within view of its towers and temples—"Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" The new city suggests the emblem of the sacred parable. The Bridegroom has come. The last vision in the chapter preceding, was of the Judge seated on his throne. But now that enthroned Lord has left the judgment-hall for the coronation-hall. The day of ever lasting espousals has arrived. Make way for the Bride, the Lamb's wife!—the glorified church without spot or blemish or any such thing. "The new heaven and the new earth" are her royal bridal-cham- "I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband!"

Such then was the Picture which rose before the enraptured eye of the seer of Patmos.

Having sought briefly to describe what John's eyes saw, let us now turn to what his ears heard; let us turn from the Picture to the great Voice. And the evangelist spectator is not now forbidden, as on a former occasion, to "write." When the seven thunders uttered their voices, after the appearance of the rainbow-crowned angel as detailed in the tenth chapter, and when he was about to transcribe, a prohibition was addressed from heaven, "Write not." No such arrest is at present put upon his hand. It is the reverse. He receives the positive instruction in ver. 5 from the great Judge himself—"Write; for these words are true and faithful." God graciously authorizes him to pen the glorious revelation for the comfort of his church in every age. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

Christ's Sovereign Right Asserted.

"And the seventh angel sounded: and there followed loud voices in heaven, saying: The kingdom of the world is become our Lord's, and his Christ's; and he will reign forever and ever." (Rev. 11:15.) Bible Union Trans.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Christian Standard having inquired: "Does the New Testament warrant the expectation that the whole world will be converted to Christianity by the preaching of, or the influence of, the gospel? From 2 Thess. 1: 7–10, et al., I infer that when the Lord comes again he will find some 'who know not God, and who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.' How then can we expect all, i. e., the world, to be converted to Christianity by the gospel before the second coming of the Lord?" The editor replies:

"We are not warranted in expecting the subjugation of the whole world to Christ either before or after his second coming. That a time is to come when the 'kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ,' is evident; but that only indicates a predominance of Christian influence, so as to shape and sway the laws and conduct of these kingdoms. So, at least, we take it. But such a millennium as some people dream of is inconsistent with all just ideas of a probationary state, and at war with all human experience. Trial, temptation, conflict, adversity, must ever enter into the cup of Christian life, until the final redemption comes."

With the latter part of this answer we heartily agree, but that something greater is intended by the announcement in Rev. 11:15 than the Standard supposes, we think is obvious from the following considerations;

1. The trumpet under which the announcement is made that the sovereignty of this world has become Christ's is emphatically declared to be a "woe" trumpet. (Comp. ch. 3: 13 with 11:14, 15.) A "woe" denotes a "great calamity," such as "a predominance of Christian influence" would not be, but such as will assuredly fall upon the "angry nations" when Christ, as the nobleman, returns from the far country, having received the kingdom. (Luke 19: 11–27); when the wrath of God comes and he destroys them that destroy or corrupt the earth.

2. At "the last trump" the righteous "dead shall be raised" and the living saints be made immortal, according to 1 Cor. 15:50–54. The seventh trumpet of the Apocalypse is the last, and under it, in harmony with Paul, we hear it said: "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great, and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth." (v. 18.) Compare with 2 Tim. 4: 1. The seventh trumpet, therefore, introduces the immortal state of the church and the judgment of the world.

3. The sovereignty which Christ obtains at the sounding of the seventh trumpet is to be endless; "He shall reign forever and ever." (See also Luke 1: 31–33.) This cannot mean that worldly kingdoms are to be in perpetual existence and the principles of Christianity have a predominating but not absolute influence over them. When the will of God is "done in earth as it is in heaven"—as it will be when the kingdom of God is established—the mixed state of things now existing, and predicted to exist till the Lord comes, will have passed away. On the regenerated earth, holiness and happiness will be universal and perpetual. "So, at least, we take it;" and, thus taking it, we look not for the conversion of the world by the preaching of the gospel, but for the return of our Saviour to consummate the hope of his church and bring back the lost inheritance.—Advent Herald.

Leadership.

Many a noble army is defeated by being badly led; many a staunch vessel is wrecked by an incompetent pilot, and many a church, or cause, or society, suffers, languishes, and dies, in consequence of poor leadership. God gives knowledge and wisdom to his people. Each church or interest planted by Christ, has in it the material needful to ensure its success; but many are wasting and perishing to-day, because poor wise men must give place to rich fools; because grace must yield to greed, and because worldly policy must sway to the exclusion of the Holy Spirit of God.

Churches are desolate to-day through the domineering of some head-strong man, too wise to learn, too ignorant to teach, too incompetent to direct, and too conceited and impudent to step aside and give place to others more competent. Important interests are jeopardized, simply that some great "I" may fill an office, or hold on to a position for which he is unfit. Nations perish because rulers will not learn wisdom, and run the vessel on the rocks, rather than admit their ignorance of the channel and call for a pilot's aid.

It is true, in the realms of "the world, the flesh, and the Devil," that an energetic man may lead downward, without much moral force; though even there a certain "honor among thieves" must exist in a marked degree, to command the regard of subordinates. But in the Church of Christ, and in the religious, moral and philanthropic enterprises of the day, all wickedness is positive weakness; and all dependence placed upon craft, policy, hypocrisy, deception and falsehood, will eventually end in ruin and confusion.

Men must be honest; men must tell the truth; men must stop deceiving and misrepresenting, and white-washing and white-lying; men must believe in God, if others are to have confidence in them; men must walk straight if they wish straight forward men to go with them. And any man who finds in his heart a disposition to show off, to appear what he is not, to put on a mask, or act a dishonest part, may be sure that God never made him for a leader in his work; and that if he crowds into such a position, sooner or later he will inevitably be found out, and kicked out, and sent to the rear, or sunk out of sight. A man who desires an office is usually unfit to fill it. An unfit man, who covets a high position, is only fixing himself for a tremendous fall. Men who are bound to "run things," are very likely to run them into the ground. Flattery, deception, soft-soap and sugar-plums, may make them popular for a time with babes and simpletons; but by and by the dullest eyes will open, the supply of sugar-plums will fail, and the duped and deceived victims will turn upon their deceivers with a fury as blind as their previous fellowship has been.

Give no quarter unto those vices which are of thine inward family, and having a root in thy temper, plead a right and property in thee. Examine well thy complexional inclination. Raise early batteries against those strongholds, built upon the rocks of nature, and make this a great part of the militia of thy life.

The Waiting Church.

B. BONAR.

The Church has waited long
Her absent Lord to see,
And still in loneliness she waits,
A friendless stranger she.
Age after age has gone,
Sun after sun has set,
And still in weeds of widowhood
She weeps a mourner yet.
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

Saint after saint on earth
Has lived, and loved, and died,
And as they left us one by one,
We laid them side by side;
We laid them down to sleep,
But not in hope forlorn—
We laid them but to ripen there
Till the last glorious morn.
Come, then, Lord Jesus come!

The serpent's broods increase,
The powers of hell grow bold;
The conflict thickens, faith is low,
And love is waxing cold.
How long, O Lord our God,
Holy and true and good,
Wilt thou not judge thy suffering Church,
Her sighs, and tears, and blood?
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

We long to hear thy voice,
To see thee face to face,
To share thy crown and glory then
As now we share thy grace.
Should not the loving Bride
Her absent Bridegroom mourn?
Should she not wear the signs of grief
Until her Sun return!
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

The whole creation groans,
And waits to hear that voice
That will restore her comeliness,
And make her wastes rejoice.
Come, Lord, and wipe away
The curse, the sin, the stain,
And make this blighted world of ours
Thine own fair world again.
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

The New Heaven and The New Earth.

(Rev. 21: 1-4, 9-12, 21, 25-27.)

REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D. D.

We have reached the concluding act in the great drama—"The things which shall be hereafter." The number of God's elect is accomplished; the bridal day of the Church Triumphant has at last arrived; the consummated bliss of Christ and his people. It is the clear shining after rain; the morning without clouds; "the darkness is past and the true light shineth." All the apocalyptic scenery regarding the Church Militant terminates with the previous chapter. All its fierce Armageddons are fought: the great assize is dissolved; the books are closed, the inquiry hushed, the wide moral gulf is fixed forever. The Evangelist is now represented standing like another Noah on the hights of Ararat, gazing on a renovated world. After passing through the crucible of its own latent fires, it has come forth, phœnix-like, from their ashes in new resurrection attire. On the occasion of the deluge, although a vast aqueous mass rolled over the surface, or part of the surface of the globe, submerging its hills and valleys, this did not involve the destruction of the planet. It rose rather from its water baptism clad in fresh loveliness and verdure. So, we have strong reason to believe, will it be in this second or last fiery baptism. The earth will be in a state of fusion;—the elements "melting with the fervent heat" (2 Pet. 3: 12):—the now imprisioned fires sweeping over its surface, charring its forests, and calcining its rocks. But though there will be displacement, dislocation, decomposition, there will be no annihilation;—these will be no more than igneous purifiers, from which it will come forth, new created,—attire in more than pristine beauty. Travellers, who have ascended Vesuvius, tell us, that some of the old lava-channels, which years ago poured down their molten streams of destruction, are now covered with luxuriant vine and purple clusters. So will it be on a vast, gigantic scale, with this world and its thousand volcanoes of living fire. Life and luxuriance well once more clothe its seamed and smitten sides. From that tremendous conflagration will emerge "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." One speciality alone is here noted in its altered physical aspect, that there will be "no more sea." These last fires have dried up the watery element—redeemed from blank those vast solitudes of ocean, which now often form a rampart, preventing the brotherhood of nations. This world's habitable platform being thus indefinitely widened and expanded, room will be made for all "the nations of the saved."

Say not these picturings of a renewed and renovated earth are too strange and incredible facts for human belief. They are not a whit more so than other Scriptural revelations dearest to our hopes and encircling our every thought of the future. Not more strange, surely, is the astounding truth that the body laid in the grave—resolved into its primeval clay—mouldering in insensate dust—is one day to rise exultant from the tomb, its pulses beating with immortality: not more strange, is the fact of the unsightly seed or grain, embedded in the ground, springing up in graceful and multiplied form;—or the dull, torpid, loathsome chrysalis, bursting its dark prison-house and soaring aloft in varied and brilliant hue;—not more strange or unaccountable are any of those, than that this earth, convulsed, shattered, disorganized—a wreck of matter—shall emerge from its grave, in holiday attire,—break from its chrysalis shell, radiant with beauty, "like the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

Man in Death.

Review of a Sermon preached by Rev. S. Fant, Pastor of the M. E. Church, Nevada, O., by Elder E. McCulloch, Pastor of the A. C Church, Nevada, O.

"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." (Eccl. 12:7.)

An attempt is made by our brother, to show that the terms Spirit and Soul, are synonymous; and that they are so used in the Bible. But an inquiry into the facts, we think, will show to every seeker after truth, the fallacy of such an attempt.

The word Ruach, which is rendered Spirit, in Ecclesiastes, 12:7, is found four hundred times in the Hebrew text, but is not once rendered Soul. Pneuma, the corresponding Greek word, is found three hundred and eighty-five times in the New Testament, and is not once rendered soul. If the terms spirit and soul are synonymous, why are they not translated from the same Hebrew and Greek word? The word Nephesh is the only one rendered soul in the Old Testament, and is never rendered spirit. Psuche is the only Greek word rendered soul in the New Testament, and is never rendered spirit. If the word spirit denotes an immortal, immaterial soul, then it follows that the beasts have immortal and immaterial souls, and there is no evading this conclusion. Hear the wise man argue this point: "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth." (Eccl. 3:21.) Here the word rendered spirit, and applied to beasts, is the same as in Eccl. 12:7, which is applied to man.

We inquire, what is the meaning of the saying, "the spirit shall return to God who gave it?" We answer, at the creation, "God breathed into man the breath of life," or, as it may just as properly be rendered, the "spirit of life." This spirit of life, the element which caused man to live, will return to God, the fountain of life. Whatever spirit returns to God existed when God gave it, and the spirit of life was given, not as a personality, but as an element, and will so return to God.

But it is said, "God is a Spirit," (John 4:24), and our brother makes a statement in connection with this text, which fails of having the least shadow of support from the Word of God, by saying God is an eternal, immortal, invisible spirit, and therefore he must be immaterial. Immateriality is defined by Webster, "as being of no essential consequence, not consisting of matter, without significance, unimportant," etc. Is this all there is of the God of the Bible? God is represented in the Bible as being a "Rock." (Ps. 18:31.) Also as being a "Fire." (Heb. 12:29.) From these passages, and many others, we may as justly claim that God is a literal "Rock," or a literal "consuming fire," as to claim that he is an immaterial spirit; for in no place does the Bible speak of God in that manner. These statements refer to his attributes; yet behind all these, there is a literal, personal, and eternal God.

But it is said God cannot be imaged forth by a material body. The position taken by our brother is at war with the express declarations of God's word, God said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." (Gen. 1:26.) We inquire, did God have an image or likeness after which he created man? Our brother says, "man, in his higher or spiritual nature, was created in the likeness of God, who is a spirit." But the record declares, "so God created man in his image, male and female created he them." (Gen. 1:27.) And "God blest them (those whom he had created in his image), and said unto them, be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth." (Gen. 1:28.) If the statement be true that God created man spiritually in his own image, and not physically, then we are forced to the conclusion that God created male and female spirits, and told them to multiply and replenish the earth." And there is no amount of cavil that can get aside this reasoning, unless we ignore, or garble the word of God.

Again, after the fall of man, or after the loss of that "higher or spiritual nature," the record still declares that man was made in the "image of God." (Gen. 9:6.) And the apostle affirms that the "Son is the express image of his (God's) person." (Heb. 1:3.) To be a person requires materiality, and as a literal, material being, Christ imaged forth the eternal God—"being the express image of his person." That Christ was a material being all must allow, after reading Luke 24:39–42. The conclusion our brother arrives at in regard to the "soul or spirit being immaterial and immortal," cannot be drawn from the word of God, as the following expressions are nowhere found in the Bible: "Immortal soul," "immaterial soul," "immortal spirit," "immaterial spirit," "never dying soul," "never dying spirit;" but from the captious manner in which they are used, we would naturally suppose the Bible full of them.

Next, we examine a text which our brother affirms "will settle, beyond all material cavil that the soul or spirit of man does not perish with the body." The text reads as follows: "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." (Matt. 10:28.) Unfortunately for our brother, this text proves too much for his theory. This saying of our Saviour is a complete refutation of our brother's argument to prove that the soul is immortal, and hence indestructible. The Saviour declares, "God is able to destroy both soul and body;" and if the soul can be destroyed, it certainly is not indestructible, nor is it immortal. And will our brother assume to teach the Saviour, and affirm that he taught them to fear a God who was able to destroy soul and body, when in fact it was impossible for him to destroy his soul, it being immortal?

The lesson the Saviour designed to teach is this: Man had not power to kill the soul, or life of man, so as to preclude his future life, which is promised at the resurrection. The term soul in this text is from the Greek word Psuche, and is rendered life forty times in the New Testament, and may as properly be rendered life in this text, and is so rendered in the Greek version of the Emphatic Diaglott. The Christian, by obedience, secures the promise of a life in the future, which cannot be obliterated by the hand of man. Man may suspend our temporal life, but it will be resumed at the resurrection; while in the case of the sinner, God will "destroy soul and body in hell." Thus, our brother's "mountain of rocks" is all visionary; and, like wax before the glowing furnace, it disappears and leaves him to gaze upon the emptiness of his own imaginations, while the truth of an eternal and material God marches on in majestic triumph over every foe. The Bible is God's mountain of truth, and if we explore it to its depths we shall find that man is not possessed with immortality; and in order to become immortal, he must "seek for it by patient continuance in well doing." (Rom. 2:7.) We shall find still further, that "immortality" is to be put on at the resurrection. (1 Cor. 15:53.) And "that God only hath immortality." (1 Tim. 6:16.) Let us abide by the express declarations of the divine word, and not assume to be wise above what is written. At the creation of man, God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." (Gen. 2:7.) The phrase, "breath of life," from "Nephesh Chaiyah," is applied to beasts, even before it is applied to man. (Gen. 1:20–30.) And if it implies an immortal soul, then it follows, as a matter of course, that the beasts have the same. After man's creation, God gave him a law to govern him; and the penalty of the law was, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." (Gen. 2:17.) Here satan steps in and contradicts the saying of the Almighty—"Ye shall not surely die." (Gen. 3:4.) And here is the only place where the inherent immortality of man is taught in the word of God, and here by satan himself. After man sinned, God shut him away from the tree of life (Gen. 3:22–24), the only means provided by which he might become immortal, and in nine hundred and thirty years Adam went down to the grave, and no intimation given, that any part remained alive. (Gen. 5:5.)

We shall next notice the prayer of Elijah: "O Lord, my God, let this child's soul come into him again; and the soul of the child came into him again, and he revived." (1 Kings 17:21, 22.) The term soul in this text is from Nephesh, and signifies life; and might as properly been translated life. Let the child's life come into him. In the 17th verse it is said, "His sickness was so sore that there was no breath left in him." The mother desired that the life of the child might be restored; and Elijah prayed, and the Lord heard, and the life of the child was restored. No intimation is given that the child had been to heaven, or hell, and called back. The child was all the time in the house.

Faith and Victory.

TO A STRUGGLING SOUL.

Dear Br. M——: You are certainly right in the conclusion that faith and obedience are both essential to Christian character; and also that saving faith is something more than a theoretical or historical belief in Christ. Such faith is hard to define, because of its simplicity. We shall understand its nature by observing its effects. The faith that saves is not a tugging, toiling, climbing process: but a relaxing, yielding, sinking process. "It is not Reason's labor, but repose." It not only believes, it also trusts. It ventures out on God's unfailing promise, and appropriates the blood that can make the foulest clean. It gladly gives all to Jesus, and in return it finds all in Jesus. Faith cuts the last rope that held us in painful suspense, and lets us drop into the Everlasting Arms. It is easy to believe when the last idol has been demolished and the last barrier has been broken down.

Faith is the hand that reaches out for a Father's blessing. It is the vital link that joines us to God. It is the key that unlocks heaven's treasury, and the channel through which the waters of life flow freely to the thirsty soul. Hence we are "justified by faith," and by faith we stand. Such a faith will bring peace—purity—power. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." We do not become boastful and self-sufficient—we feel strong only because we have an Omnipotent Backer. Our faith makes God's resources available, so that we have the benefit of his unmeasured wealth of wisdom, power, and love. Truly this is a wonderful arrangement, born of boundless benevolence.

Such a faith must either work or die. A dead faith may content itself with dry theories and pleasant dreams, but a living faith demonstrates its power and presence by producing "good works." The absence of fruit proves the worthlessness of the tree. So that, while good works cannot save us, we have no reason to expect salvation without good works. We can now understand in what sense James contended that "a man is justified by works, and not by faith only." He argues that the faith which stands alone—isolated, selfish, inactive—is dead faith. A vitalizing, God-honoring, soul-saving faith will lead to positive results, commonly called "works." These are the evidence and measure of faith, and are the outward demonstration that the man who performs them is "justified"—not by the works, but by the underlying faith that produced the works.

I fully sympathise with you, my brother, in standing squarely against a worldly policy religion, which supports itself by going "down to Egypt for help," and which shows its essential worldliness by running after the fashions and amusements of the world, by forming secret alliances with wicked men, etc. In this respect I stand exactly where I have stood for many years. Such a sham religion never received much comfort from me, even when I was associated with those who were prone to think that policy and piety made an excellent mixture. I deeply deplore the terrible and growing tendency of the age to ignore the self-denying religion of the Bible, by the substitution of carnal pleasure and glittering pomp. This is Satan's most successful snare. And yet this very condition of things in the nominal churches is a striking counterpart of certain prophetic pictures of the "last days." How important, amid the rushing tide of fashion and the feverish rage for frolic, that we "keep ourselves unspotted," while we send out a solemn warning to others. In denouncing popular sins, however, let us avoid that rasping censoriousness which will only embitter our own spirit, without benefitting those for whom we labor. We need the baptism of love, to give us "bowels of mercy" for erring humanity. This is very different from that false charity which caters to public sentiment, compromises real principle, and is always ready to apologize for the works of the devil.

You speak of doubts—standing doubts. These are surely undesirable things! Are they necessary evils? Is there no escape—no deliverance? I believe there is. It is not essential that you should be able to point to the definite time and place of your conversion; for some time the dearest of God's children were never able to do this. But an honest and earnest soul will not long be left in darkness. God wants his children to walk in the light. If any man will faithfully follow the divine leadership, it will not be long before he will be able to look up into the smiling face of his Father and claim the Spirit's witness of his discipleship.

We are not to expect exemption from trials or temptations, but if we fully consecrate ourselves to God it is our glorious privilege to be saved from sin. O make a confident of Jesus! He understands your case far better than I do, and can render you greater assistance. I have been in dark and difficult spots, during my pilgrimage, where I felt that I was not right and very much needed a fresh supply of grace. Some times—perhaps not necessarily—I have prayed and wrestled and waited for hours, before I could exercise the faith that brought light and victory. But such struggles were far better than continued defeat. If we really do fall into darkness, doubt, or condemnation, it ought to be our very first business to obtain deliverance. If we are so deep in the mire that it requires the most cutting confessions, the most desperate struggles, and the most earnest pleadings for help, to bring us safely out, emancipation from bondage even at such a price is far cheaper and better for us than to be groaning and groping and guessing our way along for months or years, uncertain, unsettled, and unsatisfied.

O my dear brother, seek for a clearing up shower! Strike for decisive victory! Pray through! Burst the chains that Satan has forged, and press your way through difficulties and discouragements, till you can touch the very hem of Jesus' garment. See that C—— M—— is crucified to this world, and committed to do the whole will of God. Without this what shall we ever be worth in the Master's vineyard? Nothing can supply the lack of heavenly unction. This is the great want of the church. How many faint and sickly ones would be effectually cured by a touch of Pentecostal power!

Deeply desiring your spiritual prosperity, I am your brother.—A. A. Phelps, in Bible Banner.

Education.

C. R. WHITE.

"'Tis education forms the mind;
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

If the young twig is inclined to grow crooked it must be bent, and made to grow straight; but it must be properly done. Man is prone to evil as the sparks fly upward, but by proper education he may avoid much that is evil. It is one thing to acquire knowledge, it is quite another thing to acquire proper knowledge; it is also another thing to make a proper use of knowledge. "Get wisdom; but, with all thy getting, get understanding." We may acquire knowledge, and by it be enabled to take undue advantage—cheat and defraud our fellow-men; or we may become benefactors to those less favored, needing counsel and advice. "Knowledge is power;" it is a power for good, or a power for evil. Education and knowledge, with many, only sharpens their wits and enables them to prey upon their fellow-men. "Educate your children, and society will become moral and virtuous," is a saying that has been rung in our ears for these many years, and with all the increase and efforts of education, society is becoming daily more immoral, more vicious, etc. In what part of society is the most extensive influences and practices found? The poor, the uneducated? Nay, but among the educated, the refined (?) so-called, the upper class of society, where naturally it would be the least expected; deep, systematic, secret schemes and practices, undermining the very strata and foundation of society.

Education, like every other means that has been put forth for the amelioration of man—morally and religiously—has proved a failure. Peace societies, temperance societies, Christian unions, etc., etc., all have failed. All have effected some, good or less, but as a general thing the friends of all these societies admit that the evils they are combating only increases. Even with all the "important improvements of the medical art," are diseases in general more easily cured than formerly? There is no hope for the world but the blessed hope of Jesus' coming.

Satan at Work.

M. D. PEAVY.

Satan's power over the human heart has ever been magical. Often-times the child of God, whose name is enrolled in the Book of Life, has felt the grasp of his ruthless hand and the sharpened edge of his hellish dart; often-times he has meekly bowed to the blow without knowing why or whence it came. Satan is vigilant, alert and subtle; his snares are intricate and wily; he follows the minister, bows at the altar, and sometimes fills the pulpit; he is active and always in whispering distance of Mr. Critic, and is a genial friend of Mrs. "They say." With his army of helpers he invades the peaceful, loving, and confiding army of Christ; he comes as a friend, and not as a foe—as an angel of light! His soldiers are well disciplined; each knows his duty and his post. Once within the fold his work of prey is sure and complete. Already his eagle eye has singled out his victim. It is the pastor, the beloved pastor, him that is almost worshiped for his piety and zeal. He has adopted the principle that by cutting off the head the body will perish. His workers are all ready for action, and burning for an encounter. Lo! the signal for the onset is given; all are alert in an instant. Mr. Critic makes a point, and a poisoned thrust is the result. That is taken up by Mrs. "They say," and heralded to the four winds. They say this, they say that. Of course, Mr. Backbite knows all about it, and is very particular about telling it to all of his friends, with the simple injunction, "Don't let him know that I said it." But Lady Scandal is neither so oily-tongued or deceitful; she will make a clean breast of the matter.

At this point Mr. Pride can bear it no longer; his dignity is aroused, his honor is at stake; to be sure he knows the stories are all false, and honesty would require their refutation. But they are popular, and what is honesty when in the balance with popularity? The parson must leave and give room for a more popular man. Satan now walks out, but in the distance we hear the echo of his ironical laugh, well-knowing that his victory is complete; he is again going to and fro, seeking whom he may devour. He does not always use the same instruments of warfare in his battles; neither does he always make the same points the centre of attack, but will often pounce upon the most tender lamb of the fold, or wage simultaneous action. I never heard of his being defeated by only one general—Jesus. He is now calling for volunteers. He offers a large bounty—eternal life. Will you enlist?

Loss of Heat.

MARTHA TRASK.

The room was very warm but a little time ago, why is it so cool now? The fire is burning as brightly in the stove as before, and the light shines out cheerilly through the plates. Look about; ah, some one has left open the doors of the rooms adjoining the study. There has been a loss of heat while the cold air has been rushing in. The stove shall not be blamed, we will not complain of the fire, but we will look after the doors a little more carefully.

Many of us get a great deal of blessing during the course of a year. The Holy Spirit often visits our hearts, and at times kindles an intense flame of zeal. Our words catch fire, faces shine with the reflected glory of God. Time appears too brief for our work, souls too precious for words, and eternity too important to fall out of memory for an hour. We have many hours of meditation and of gazing in faith upon the face of Christ. We take advantage of opportunities for help, go to hear the preaching of the word, attend the social means of grace, hear earnest exhortations and respond warmly. But after all, if the mean temperature of the daily life of such professors of religion were taken, the average degree of religious heat reported, would be astonishingly low. The trouble is not with the occasional seasons, but with the ordinary hours; not with the weekly meetings, but with the intervening days. Hence the poor report annually, "Whence this loss of heat? where are these open doors?"

One door which is a besetting sin is light and foolish talk. But a good brother, naturally jovial, likes young people, is a dear, good brother, an able man. But after many years, reports a serious loss at the hands of this little enemy, seemingly so small, and yet often so hard to conquer. The word bids us rejoice with those who rejoice, but we are warned against jesting, for it is not fit, proper, or becoming, for a Christian in these days of peril. And only Jesus and a determined will can give the victory over this dangerous foe, which is a thief, stealing away our power while we are spiritually asleep. Neglect of prayer is an open door through which the heat of religious zeal flies away. Not absolute omission of the regular prayer hour, but the failure to get special victory, the falling below what we have previously reached. He who prays strongly and does not recede from advance ground taken will soon be one of the "mighty men" of Israel, oh that God would make mighty men and women for the pulling down of the strong hold of the enemy. Prayer is the Christian's vital breath, is the beginning, middle, and end of his success. Hesitating to perform our Christian duty, delay of positive claims on Jesus, grieves the Spirit of God, and is a spiritual wound to our spiritual life. It unnerves the spiritual man, and has been the cause of a thousand religious shipwrecks. The rule of the aged Christian given to a young disciple is the key of pleasant service to Christ: "Do present duty." An ignoring of the claims of holiness is an avenue for the escape of soul warmth. We go into a conference meeting and many will refer to their conversion; how happy they were when they felt that they loved the Lord with all their heart.

Now they complain of being cold and indifferent, of making many crooked paths. What can God do with such instruments to work in his vineyard? Let holiness of heart be our motto, and then we will go from strength to strength. As a veteran worker for Jesus said, with emphatic gesture, "away with crooked paths and open doors."

Sectarianism.

AMOS SANFORD.

Webster defines sectarianism to be, "the disposition to dissent from the established church or predominant religion, and to form new sects." The predominant religion of this country is based upon one single passage of Scripture, (Gen. 3:4,) which plainly shows that the doctrine of man's inherent immortality was taught in the garden of Eden, in these words, "ye shall not surely die." Dissenting from the doctrine of the serpent which was proven to be false, (Gen. 5:5) I have to acknowledge that I am inclined toward sectarianism, at least in part.

But when I look at the different and numerous sects of these last days, and recognize the truth of Webster's remark that "most sects have originated in a particular person, who taught and promulgated some peculiar notions in philosophy or religion, and who is considered to be its founder," I am decidedly a non-sectarian, and yet I am a sectarian. "Explain this paradox," says one.

Well, take your lamp and "come let us reason together." We see the word "sect" occurs in the Acts of the Apostles five times, and is used nowhere else in the sacred writings. Observe that there are but three sects spoken of, viz: "sect of the Sadducees," (ch. 5: 17,) "sect of the Pharisees," (15: 5,) and "sect of the Nazarenes," (24: 5.) "Concerning this sect [the Nazarenes] we know that everywhere it is spoken against," (28: 22.) Paul says, (26:5,) "after the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee;" but his connection with that sect was severed by the power of God, and ever afterward he belonged to the "sect of the Nazarenes." Jesus of Nazareth was the founder of this sect. It was originated in his particular person. He taught and promulgated the true Hebrew faith—"the hope of Israel," for which Paul was bound in chains.

Hence, I believe in this one kind of sectarianism, and reject all other sects, but "the sect of the Nazarenes," "first called Christians at Antioch." (11:26.)

All true Christians belong to this sect; and although their names may or may not be recorded in the church books, they are written in the Lamb's book of Life, and they will receive their reward when Jesus comes. That time is near. The words, "Surely I come quickly," were never so literally true as "just now;" and all members of the "sect of the Nazarenes" are saying, "AMEN: Even so come Lord Jesus."

The Ancient Faith.

O. D. GIBSON.

It is claimed by our opponents that our faith is of modern origin, and no one has believed it until recently. I thought, while reading D'Aubigne's "History of the Reformation," I would keep an eye on this point and see if I could discover any traces of it. In Vol. II, I found one reference to the immortality of the soul. One of the Roman Catholic princes brought it as one accusation against the Lutherans, that "some of them denied the immortality of the soul." This is the only direct reference made to this point in the first four volumes. But in Vol. III we have the account of the death of the three first martyrs after the reform began. Their last words were, "Lord Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on us." The historian says: "Their bodys were quickly wrapt in flames; they shouted Te Deum laudamus'. Soon their voices were stifled and their ashes alone remained." When Luther heard of their triumphant death, he wrote a hymn on it, and of course we shall see what their faith is; for, in hymns, theology in faith will stick out if anywhere. But in this hymn of the Reformer we see the true ancient faith, and none of modern tradition. Here it is:

"Flung to the heedless winds,
Or on the waters cast,
Their ashes shall be watched,
And gathered at the last.

And from that scattered dust,
Around us and abroad,
Shall spring a plenteous seed,
Of witnesses to God.

Jesus hath now received
Their latest living breath.
Yet vain is Satan's boast,
Of victory in their death.

Still, still, though dead they speak,
And trumpet-tongued proclaim,
To many a wakening land,
The one availing name."

This has the true Apostolic sound; no immortal souls scaling the battlements of heaven with silvered wings, but "Their ashes shall be watched and gathered at the last." Thus, the resurrection was their hope of getting into eternal reward. Jesus has now received their latest living breath, but not their immortal spirits.

Better Take a Sheep Too.

A valued friend and able farmer, about the time the temperance reform was beginning to exert a healthful influence, said to his newly hired man:—

"Jonathan, I did not think to mention to you when I hired you that I shall try and have my work done this year without rum. How much must I give you to do without?"

"Oh," said Jonathan, "I don't care much about it; you may give me what you please."

"Well," said the farmer, "I will give you a sheep in the fall if you will do without rum."

"Agreed."

"Father, will you give me a sheep too, if I do without rum?" then asked the elder son.

"Yes, you shall have a sheep if you do without."

The youngest son then said: "Father will you give me a sheep if I will do without?"

"Yes, Chandler, you shall have a sheep also."

Presently Chandler speaks again: "Father, hadn't you better take a sheep, too?"

The farmer shook his head; he hardly thought he could give up the "critter" yet, but the appeal came from a source not easily to be disregarded; and the result was, the demon rum was thenceforth banished from the premises to the great joy and ultimate happiness of all concerned.—Sel.

The Christian Life.

An Angel's Visit.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATION OF A RETIRED LIFE."

An angel came through the frosty air,
'Mid carol singing and steeple chime;
A blessing of peace in his hand he bore,
Sent down by the king, who one winter day
In a stable manger a baby lay,
To give us the holy Christmas time:
And the angel came on his earthward way.

He came to the court where the monarch stood,
In his purple robe and his golden band,
While his people praised him and called him good,
And his name went echoing through the land;
And the angel thought it a place to stay.
So the king passed out in his abbey choir,
With his nobles round him in joy and pride;
Then a beggar cried from the chilly mire,
But the monarch shuddered and turned aside;
And the angel sorrowed and went his way.

He watched by the beggar that mirky morn,
A weariful man with a load of pain,
Who expected nothing but pence and scorn,
And often expected the pence in vain;
Then a meal was sent to the beggar's seat,
And a starved dog came and implored a bone,
But the beggar spurned with his naked feet,
Taking God's mercy and giving none;
And the angel sorrowed and went his way.

Then he marked a maid in a festive scene.
Sweet thrilled her voice in the season's song,
Though since last she sang it such a change had [illegible]
That the one prayer left her was, "Lord how long?"
And the angel paused on his onward way.
Through all her sorrow she smiled the same,
Lest her gloom should shadow others' glee;
And she sang in the light of the Christmas flame,
Though she sighed in the shade of the Christmas tree:
And the angel knew it a place to stay.

The king had presents of gems and gold,
The beggar had gifts that Christmas time,
But the maiden sat with woe untold,
Yet she felt its weight from her soul unbind;
For an angel rose on the frosty wind,
'Mid carol singing and steeple chime.
And he left his blessing of peace behind.

What an Old Man has Noticed.

I have noticed that all men are honest when they are watched.

I have noticed that silks, broadcloths and jewels are often bought with other people's money.

I have noticed that whatever is is right, with a few exceptions, the left eye, the left leg, and the left side of a plum pudding.

I have noticed that the prayer of the selfish man is, "Forgive us our debts," while he makes everybody who owes him pay to the utmost farthing.

I have noticed that he who thinks every man a rogue is very certain to see one when he shaves himself, and he ought, in mercy to his neighbor, to surrender the rascal to justice.

I have noticed that money is the fool's wisdom, the knave's reputation, the poor man's desire, the covetous man's ambition, and the idol of all.

I have noticed that all men speak well of all men's virtues when they are dead, and that tombstones are marked with the epitaphs of the good and virtuous. Is there any particular cemetery where the bad men are buried.

Gifts.

Some have gifts without them rather than within them—gifts, for instance, of worldly position, estate, and substance. These ought to be well used, and, considering that in these times we have a starving world to deal with, and that one of the great impediments to the spread of the gospel is with some of us the lack of means fer the maintenance of those who should preach the Word, it does seem a strange thing that professors should lay by God's money and use it as if it were their own. When for our orphans, our students, our colporteurs, and missionaries, we need funds, how can men love the Lord with all their hearts, and keep their thousands cankering at their bankers, or their tens resting in their purses? They have not learned to provide for themselves bags that wax not old. They do not understand that to keep their money they must give it away, that truly to preserve it they must dedicate it to God. For that which is kept by the miserly for themselves is not really preserved, but wasted. That which is expended in the Master's service is laid up in heaven, where neither moth nor rust can corrupt.—Spurgeon.

THE secret of being rightly guided—guided of God—is to have our own will thoroughly subdued. "The meek he will guide in judgment; and the meek will He teach His way."

Prayer With Children.

An article in The Advance, on giving the children part in family worship, has called out this testimony from a widowed mother:

"We have tried it in our family, and my heart is to day full of thankfulness to God for the blessed results. When my husband left us to follow, as he felt, 'the call of God,' to serve in the army of the Rebellion, I said to my boys (then but [illegible] and five years old) 'Instead of p[illegible] at your bedside, you may pray here with me at our evening worship.' We sang as we had been accustomed to when my husband and father was with us. We kneeled with the same burden pressing on each of our hearts, and the youngest in that little circle knew, as if by instinct, how to get at the heart of God as well as the oldest. The result was, we were quieted, comforted by our expectations from God, and the exercise so met our want we were led to continue it. More than ten ye[illegible]ve passed, and we could not now [illegible]nfluenced to give it up.

"Blessed results have followed. Those sons are trusting in God, and pledged to any service to which he shall call them. They were, by the Spirit of God, early called into his kingdom, and have always found it comparatively easy to pray in meetings for prayer, and elsewhere, when it seemed best for them to do so. God has so often met them in their wants and granted their requests, that their confidence in him, and in prayer to him, is strong. It has 'grown with their growth, and strengthened with their strength,' until it will take more than a Professor Tyndall to shake it."—Advocate.

Striking Anecdote.

The worth and power of ripe scholarship in preaching to children or in teaching them, are forcibly shown in the sermons which Dr. Crosby, of New York, gives to the little folks of his congregation every Sunday afternoon.

On a recent occasion his text was was about Ahaz, and the sermon depended for its interest wholly upon the speaker's perfect knowledge of the history, his intimate acquaintance with localities, and growing out of that, his graphic description of scenes and events, his vivid delineation of the character of the man who chose to bow down to Assyrian gods, and his faithful and striking application to child-life of the lesson which the ruin of that man teaches.

A single illustration, not drawn from the text, was used and it ought to find a place in every teacher's scrapbook. "Two months ago I was in Florida, and one day a party of us seeking enjoyment planned a rowing match between two colored boys. They were to go out on the river to a stake-boat about a mile from the shore, and then pull for dear life to see which could first reach the dock. Somebody went out in a third boat to manage the start, and I went in one of the racing boats to act as coxswain or steersman for one of the colored boys, whose name was Cyrus. Of course I was anxious to win, and I knew in order to do it we must not lose a single stroke of the oar, or go crooked, so I said to the boy, 'Now Cyrus, you must trust me. Don't try to see which way you are going, nor how the others are getting on, but just look at me and bend to your oars. I will keep you straight and steady, and bring you out ahead safely to the goal.'

"But soon Cyrus was twisting his head first over one shoulder, and then over the other, trying to catch sight of the dock, and again and again I had to say to him, 'Stop, Cyrus, look at me.'

The speaker's simple enforcement of this illustration, showing the reasonableness and safety of committing our way to the Lord, came home with power to the hearts of many who have passed far beyond childhood.

Advent Christian Times.

Wm. Sheldon, - Editor.

*₊*Give your Name, Postoffice, County and State every time you write.

CHICAGO, Tuesday, August 12, 1873.

New Volume.

It will be observed that the present number of The Times is the beginning of a new volume. We hope that our friends will help us make it an interesting one. We wish to see our columns crowded with articles that will thrill the hearts of the saints scattered abroad; but if this is the case, such articles must be furnished by our correspondents. Let no one complain of seeing poor articles in The Times who can write better ones. Let us have a sufficient quantity to select from, and we will try [illegible] the best; though, being fallible, we are liable to make mistakes, which we trust will be excused. We shall try to do our part, and trust others will, that the paper may furnish the food that will give health to the flock. "Feed the flock of God."

The tent meeting on Ada and Lake streets, held by Br. Kinnan, still continues.

Letters sent to the Editor, not intended for publication, should be marked "personal," on the outside of the envelope, to secure earlier attention.

Last week one brother sent us eleven new subscribers' names in one mail. If all our ministers would do as well as that, we should soon be in a condition to double the usefulness of the paper.

New subscribers are now coming in more plentifully than for a long time in the past, which is an encouraging feature. But there is still chance for improvement. Let the good work go on.

Bro. S. C. Wellcome writes that he has recently received twenty new members into the Monticello (Minn.) church, and expects to receive several more soon. Good news for these dry times.

Eld. C. C. Ramsay recently spent two Sundays with the Green Street Church in this city. He was once their pastor, and his short visit was one of mutual interest. Iowa is his present field of labor.

We learn that the recent discussion on "Time," between Elds. Whitmore and Barker, held in Rochester, N. Y., will soon be published in book form, when both sides can be read by all who wish to read. Notice in time as to price.

As we are frequently importuned by friends in different localities to visit them on short notice, we would suggest the propriety of an earlier apprisal of their wishes, that we may arrange if possible to comply. It often happens that we have appointments ahead for several weeks.

We call attention to Br. I. C. Wellcome's proposed "History of the Second Advent Message." It is a theme which might be made both interesting and profitable to outsiders, as well as to our brethren, if properly presented; and we believe Br. Wellcome's pen will draw a clear picture of the past.

"Man in Death."—The article with this heading commenced in this number of The Times, is copied from the Nevada Enterprise, it being the review of a sermon preached against our faith by a Methodist minister. The writer is Eld. E. McCulloch, pastor of the Nevada (Ohio) Church. Now as Br. McCulloch has shown his ability to handle the pen, we trust we shall receive frequent communications from him for our paper.

Mother Shipton's Prophecy.—This poetic prophecy, purporting to have been written about 400 years, foretelling a time to come, when was copied into The Times several months ago. A brother requests its re-publication, with the proof that it was really written 400 years ago. This proof we are not in possession of, and query whether it is to be obtained. Will inquire of other publishers, who inserted it before we did.

Our Southern friends, who wish a supply of the "Disembodied State" for free circulation, as before offered, will please remember that all orders for this object must be made before September first, as we have only a limited quantity to thus circulate, and wish to know how to equalize them among the different solicitors. Let none make orders after our lot for free distribution is exhausted. These orders should be sent to Wm. Sheldon, Brodhead, Wis. All others can obtain them by addressing our Business Agent.

The voice of inspiration is continually calling us away from carnality to purity. Hear its call:

> "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." "Be ye therefore perfect." "Be perfect." "Be thou an example unto the believers in purity." "Go on unto perfection." "Perfect holiness in the fear of God." "Keep thyself pure." "Purify your hearts." "Put on the whole armor of God." "If we walk in the light, the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

Let ministers not only admit the correctness of this God-given standard, but live it out, and thus be practical "ensamples unto the flock." Then shall the work of the Lord flourish in our hands.

Destruction as a Penalty.

Scriptural statements are numerous which bring to view the destruction of the wicked as the punishment incurred by their sins. But what kind of destruction is meant? We will first answer negatively:

1. It cannot be a kind of destruction which is preserving in its nature, for preservation is the very opposite of destruction in ordinary conversation; and if the Bible meaning of destroy so far differs from its ordinary import as to signify preserve, the Bible would be made to affirm some strange ideas, as for instance: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might preserve the works of the devil." (1 John 3: 8.) "That through death he might preserve him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." (Heb. 2: 14.) This would involve the conclusion that Christ came into the world to prevent the devil and his works from coming to an end, by preserving them. If this was not the object of Christ's mission, then preserve cannot be the Bible meaning of the word "destroy." What then, is its meaning?

2. The destruction awaiting the sinner cannot be spiritual destruction, or being destroyed morally, for this kind of destruction is never visited upon man by the Lord, but man brings it upon himself by sinning: "Thou hast destroyed thyself;" and this self-inflicted moral destruction is the state of guilt which renders man deserving of punishment, instead of being the punishment its[illegible] and this moral destruction precedes the judgment day, while the destruction which the Lord will inflict, comes after the judgment arrives; and furthermore this moral destruction may be terminated by pardon, but the destruction to be inflicted on the sinners at the judgment day is "everlasting destruction."

3. This threatened destruction cannot mean the destroying of the sinner's happiness, as we are sometimes told, for many of them are already void of happiness, and the same destruction is due the devil and his angels who have no happiness to destroy.

4. It cannot be a destruction of their sins, as others insist, for this would convert punishment into a blessing, and would prove the universal salvation of sinners and devils, at the very time God threatens to punish them. God threatens the sinner with what—with destruction of his sins at the judgment? What kind of a penalty would that be? Would in not rather be an inducement to continue in sin, instead of a threat to deter from sin? None of these kinds of destruction can be God's penalty for sin. Then what kind of destruction is due transgressors when the day of doom arrives? We answer affirmatively, literal destruction, a sample of which is presented in the case of the Sodomites: "But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." (Luke 17 : 30.) "And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly." (2 Pet. 2: 6.) "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them in like manner, ...are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." (Jude 7.) This fire which "destroyed" the Sodomites, and reduced the cities of the plain to "ashes," is styled "eternal fire," as God's "ensample" or "example;" and it certainly made a literal destruction. If the sample is not to be repudiated, we cannot mistake the nature of the destruction hereafter due the ungodly. In the sample as Jesus says, "it destroyed them all." This destruction was the very opposite of preservation—yet it is the God-given sample. It was accomplished by "eternal fire," or fire which the Eternal God sent upon them: "Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." If literal fire came down then, it will come again. If it literally "destroyed them all" then its destruction will be just as literal hereafter. It will be destruction coming "from the presence of the Lord," when he "shall be revealed from heaven."

Our Saviour.

A proper appreciation of the true character of our Divine Master will better fit us to honor him, even as we do the Father. He was among men as "the mighty God," veiled in flesh—Immanuel, "God with us,"—not God the Father, but the Son of God, possessed of superhuman wisdom and power; and during his entire mission, this wisdom and power was shining out, thus augmenting the proof of his divinity. When but twelve years old, the doctors of the law were astonished at his wisdom, which so far surpassed their store of information, which they had spent scores of years in accumulating. He knew the actions, thoughts, and conversations held between men, even when they were out of his natural sight, and at a distance from him. Upon one occasion the takers of tribute accosted Peter with the question: "Doth not your Master pay tribute?" Peter replied, "Yes." When Peter went into the house where Jesus was, before Peter had time to speak about the required tribute money, Jes[illegible] to Peter: "Go thou to [illegible] and cast in a hook, and take up a fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money; that take, and give unto them for me and thee." (Matt. 17: 27.) Human wisdom could not thus have told that there was money in the mouth of a certain fish down in the sea, nor that this particular fish should be the first one to take Peter's hook into his mouth; nor yet that this piece of money should be just enough to pay the tax imposed on himself and Peter.

When Nathaniel, who had never seen Jesus, approached him, Jesus said: "Behold an Israelite, indeed, in whom is no guile." This led Nathaniel to inquire: "Whence knowest thou me!" Said Jesus: "Before that Philip called thee, when thou was under the fig tree, I saw thee." (John 1:47.) This superhuman wisdom convinced Nathaniel that Jesus was the Messiah: "Thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel." When Jesus sent two disciples to find a place to prepare the passover supper, he told them that after they had entered into the city, they should meet a man bearing a pitcher of water, to follow him into the house, and there they should be shown a large upper room already furnished. (Luke 22: 10.) Human wisdom could not have told whether a man with a pitcher would then be met; whether the pitcher would contain water or milk; whether by following him into the house they would find a room or not; whether it would be an "upper" room or a lower room; whether it would be a "large" room or a small room; or whether it would be "furnished" or unfurnished.

When Jesus sent two disciples over into the village after a colt to ride on, he told them they would find it tied, one "whereon man never sat;" to untie it, and when the owner should ask why they untied it, to say: "The Lord hath need of him," and he should send him. (Mark 11:2.) Human wisdom could not have told whether a colt could be found there; or if found, whether it would be tied; or whether it had been rode upon previously; or whether the owner would consent to send it. In addition to such wisdom, he had power to tame the wild colt at once, to still the raging storm with a word, to walk on the sea as on dry land, to feed thousands of hungry people from a few small loaves; to restore sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, health to the sick, and life to the dead. Such a being was our Saviour before his crucifixion. Now he is immortalized and glorified. Soon he will return to earth, and display his power on a greater scale in waking up the dead, and exercise his unbounded wisdom in judging the race.

Motive to Induce Repentance.

A friend wishes to know if the theory of the final destruction of the wicked does not invalidate the motive which leads sinners to repentance? We repeat what we have elsewhere said:

The most that can be truthfully said is, that it takes away a spurious motive; but it leaves the gospel motive unimpaired, viz: "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance." (Rom. 2: 4); and "Godly sorrow worketh repentance" (2 Cor. 7: 10); and "We love him because he first loved us." (1 John 4:19) This principle of divine goodness and love, when properly impressed upon the mind, will awaken godly sorrow in the heart, and thus lead to repentance; and a repentance produced in the absence of principle, but exclusively by the fear of eternal torment, is worthless, though it may savor of unfeigned sincerity. Many have been moved in part by this principle of fear, while the true principle was underlying it, and have proved true Christians; for when the fear has subsided, the underlying principle continued to propel them; but those who have been moved only by fear, invariably relapse into sin after the principle of fear has spent its force upon them, and thus the world has been filled with millions of backsliders who have been once scared into repentance, but never led into it by the persuasive and compelling love. The man who is initiated into the service of God by a spurious motive will remain there only so long as that motive operates upon him. If influenced by a motive of divine attraction, it will continue to do its work, unless repelled. If influenced only by a spell of fear, driving him, instead of inviting him, when the spell of fear subsides, he will become inactive.

The sailor who repents and prays in the terrific storm, and relapses into sin when the sun shines, has served God while the motive power of fear operated upon him. The intimidated child who professes love to the tyranical father who stands over it with the threatening whip, to extort that profession, will loose all of its love when the whip is out of sight. So the man who professes to love God, and serves him simply to escape eternal torments, will be active while that principle of fear operates on him; but though sincere, he is moved by a wrong principle, and also by a short lived one, unless the true principle is underlying it. This spurious principle of fear is worthless when alone, and is of no advantage to the true principle when connected with it.

It is true that God has made threats against the wicked, to show them what they will lose by continuing in sin, and what their destiny will be in contrast with the future of the redeemed; but this is not to frighten them into repentance, but to operate on their enlightened judgment as a tributary inducement to seek life through Christ. The man who candidly looks at destruction in contrast with eternal life, though he should see nothing in it to frighten him, sees much to induce him to choose eternal life. The end of the one class is not inviting, but repulsive; while the future of the other class is delightful to contemplate.

To those who affirm that destruction is no punishment, we remark, that it involves the loss of everything secured by the saints; and if what they secure is no reward to them, then the loss of it to the wicked is no punishment. Is it a trivial matter to lose eternal life, with all its attendant glories, and pass under the dark waves of oblivion, never more to rise? Nor does this punishment consist exclusively in loss, but there is a terrible display of divine "vengeance" interwoven with destruction, in addition to the loss sustained.

A Noble Example.

Eld. George Howard, of Wisconsin, thus writes concerning the transfer:

> I see by the paper that the transfer has been made from the old Association to the new. I am glad that this has finally been accomplished, and now hope that the paper will be better sustained—financially. It seems to me that I—as one of the Advent body—am in duty bound to do what I can; and I hereby pledge you $50.00, to be paid within ninety days. I would like better to send the money to day; but, being a farmer, I have to depend on my crops, which I have just commenced harvesting.

Eld. Howard is not a rich man; spends a large portion of his time in preaching without pay; makes a [illegible] for himself and family from a small farm of forty or fifty acres; yet he steps out and sets an example of sacrifice to be followed by others. We know, personally, more than one hundred different Advent believers in the west who are better able to pay $200 apiece, than Eld. Howard is to pay his fifty dollars. They may plead they have no money on hand. Neither has Eld. Howard; yet, like a man who loves the cause, he obligates himself to help when his money comes in. They may plead they are a little in debt. And so might Br. Howard, but he would not thus try to dodge God's claim upon him. They may plead that they have local claims upon their generosity, to help build a meeting house, or something of this kind. So might Br. Howard have done, for he but recently lifted heavily to help pay for a house of worship in his own town—not that he was rich, but his heart was in the matter. Now he comes forward to help another branch of the cause. You who have your 100 acres, or your 200 acres or more, ask yourself what you ought to do compared with the case in hand. Don't read this for somebody else, for conscience whispers, "Thou art the man." This pledge of $50 is large, compared to a pledge of $100 from many that we know. To say that you don't see why the office is in debt, does not change the fact. Physicians may say they don't see why the small pox got into town; will that be regarded a good reason why they should not apply the remedy? Such excuses do not remove the debt.

Modern Religion.

The religion of the day is entirely unlike the religion of the Bible. We are not now speaking from a theological stand-point, but refer to its spirit. In Bible times, religion separated people from the world, and made them "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Now we behold an assimilation to the world on the part of those who profess religion, and they are pre-eminently lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, provided we allow their actions to speak, which so often speak louder than words. How unlike the apostles advice: "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable, and perfect will of God." As the heart cannot be fired with the love of God, and the love of the world at the same time, the fact that the love of the world mainly predominates in the nominal church, is proof conclusive of a sickly religion within. Where is the victory over the world, over self, over sin, over satan, which was once enjoyed. Where is the "pure and undefiled religion," which formerly kept its possessor "unspotted from the world?" Has God's plan changed? Or have men swerved from that plan, and hewn out to themselves broken cisterns that can hold no water? We need earnestly to inquire for the old paths of experimental religion, and to walk therein. This modern substitute for religion is a worthless coin. We want radical Christianity.

Perfect Love.

Perfect love is the basis of perfect obedience. And that heart which is fully under the control of divine love, and unfettered by carnality, can sweetly rest in Christ, in the storm or in the sunshine. Says the Rev. W. McDonald, in speaking of this rich experience:

> In this blessed state, faith claims every romise; humility ascribes all glory to God; signation sweetly sings, "Not as I will, but s thou wilt;" patience calmly endures whatver the Father allows, and joyfully receives whatever he sends; meekness never gives way o petulance, nor allows anger; self-denial ands like the bullock between the plough nd the altar, ready for toil or sacrifice; while arity has not only a tongue to bless, but and to help. In such a state, peace flows like river, in perpetual plentitude to the soul; y springs like a fountain whose source is e highest hill-top; hope holds the soul in lissful expectation of good divinely promised; e knows no tormenting fear.
> Such a one is crucified with Christ. The dy of sin being dead, the law of sin no nger wars in his members. The Commandments are no longer grievous unto him, but re the delight of his heart. Whatever he oes—whether he prays, labors, studies, eats, leeps—he does all with a single eye. Deghting, as he does, in the law of the Lord, it s his meat and drink to do his Father's will.

Shaken in Mind.

The Methodist Recorder says:

> "The doctrine of the Immortality of the ul is rarely, if ever, called in question among s. But some have been shaken in mind as the continuous, conscious existence of the oul during the period intervening between e death of the body and the resurrection. There are those who hold that during this nterval the functions of the immaterial part re suspended, and that the soul as well as e body is de facto dead."

We are glad to see this frank admission there is at least a partial swerving from this dogma going on. The renunciation of the theory of "the continuous conscious existence of the soul during the period intervening between the death of the body and the resurrection," is a long step toward a repudiation of soul-immortality. The difference is so trivial that one view cannot long be held without leading to the other. If the soul is not conscious in the intermediate state, it might as well not be immortal till the resurrection, as we hold.

A Great Truth.

It is a truth of no trivial magnitude that Jesus will come back to earth again on a mission of no less importance than the establishment of his kingdom. This truth must be kept before the people in spite of the accumulating aversion to it. Nor must we be silent with reference to the nearness of this event. If some have looked for it too soon, let us not look for it too late. If some have assumed to know too much about the time when it is due, let us not know too little about it. This great truth must not be kept out of sight to please its enemies, or through fear we may claim to know too much about the time of Christ's return. He bids us know when he is near. Let us watch with ready hearts. He will soon be here.

Articles Needed.

This being the busy season of the year, our supply of articles is limited. Let our friends interest themselves to write short articles and letters from every part of the field. Do not punish our readers with too long articles. If you can crack a theological nut, give us the meat without the shucks. If you can tell a rich experience, give us the cream without the skim milk. In a word, on whatever theme you choose to write, give us the pith and point without wasting words and monopolizing space to no profit. This will suit our readers and do the most good. Let our ministers take up their pens and cheer the household of faith with a few words.

Anonymous Articles.

On assuming our present responsibility, we wish it distinctly understood that we are not in favor of publishing anonymous articles. We would not make it an invariable rule that no article shall be inserted without the writer's name, though we much prefer the name should go with the article; but must at least insist that the name be given to the Editor, even if withheld from our readers. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the article will leave a better impression if accompanied by the writer's name. It looks more like square work, and less like dodging the responsibility.

A new tract will soon be ready for circulation, entitled:

THE DISEMBODIED STATE EXAMINED,
With an exposition of
"OUR EARTHLY HOUSE,"
And
THE RICH MAN'S HELL.
BY WM. SHELDON.

The price will probably be 16 cents single, or $1.00 per dozen, by mail. Orders can be sent now to the Business Agent, so as to be among the first to be supplied. Better order by the dozen, so as to give or lend to your neighbors, and thus do good to them and help the office at the same time. The profits will go to the Society instead of the author.

No lie can be dangerous unless it be the ghost of some truth.

IT was George Herbert who said a handful of good life is worth a bushel of learning.

Ministers beginning to see.

The following is clipped from an editorial in the World's Crisis:

> On our way from Philadelphia to New York, Monday, July 21st, we fell in company with a minister * * * who wished to know our views of the millennium. After stating them, he said he thought the coming of Christ was kept too much in the background. We found this brother living near to Jesus, and loving his appearing. The Lord is waking up his children to the fact that he is coming soon, and they are more and more interested in the glorious event. We think it will not be long before we shall see and hear many new witnesses on this glorious truth. Let all who see the light, double their diligence, and do all in their power to scatter the good news in all directions.

Short or Long Sermons.

P. W. HOUGH.

Much has been said and written of late about short sermons. Some have offered one reason and some another. Some have limited the time to twenty minutes, but I observe none of them appeal to Jesus or his apostles as examples. I have been a silent looker on, hoping that those ministers who have command of language so perfectly that they can get at all the facts in twenty minutes to make a good sermon would remember us who are not so highly favored, and therefore it takes us an hour to say as much as you can in twenty minutes. We are glad you can do so much more than we, for the King's business needs haste, but please don't publish us in the papers when we exceed your time. Send us a private note pointing out our mistake, we may yet learn.

We Kneel When We Pray.

A golden sentence; and let all the people say Amen!

Kneeling in prayer is scriptural. Elijah, David, Daniel, and hosts of holy men and women of the Bible bowed their knees in prayer. And, above all, Christ our Lord, who is our pattern, knelt. "And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down and prayed." Therefore, "Oh, let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker."

Kneeling in prayer is rational. It is the position that expresses dependence and want. Are we not altogether dependent on God, and do we not need anything? It betokens humility, submission, and earnest entreaty. Does it not behoove sinners to approach the Most High and Lofty One, before whose majestic and holy presence angels vail their faces—humbly and submissively, and in all sincerity implore pardon and salvation?

Kneeling in prayer is most natural and appropriately expressive. Does not kneeling come very natural in time of great affliction and danger, even to impenitent and godless men? Have not hundreds fallen upon their knees, and called for help when in imminent danger upon the great deep? Yea, we know that such men dropped upon their knees even during a hail storm and implored heaven to spare them. The uncivilized nations of the earth are led by this instinct of nature, to kneel and prostrate themselves when they appear in the presence of their superiors. And this attitude is so beautifully and appropriately expressive of prayer, that it needs no explanation to any one in order to understand what it means. Seeing one upon his knees, with folded hands and uplifted eyes, the wildest savage at once understands the meaning, and even he feels some chord of his rude nature touched.

How, then, shall one find a shadow of excuse for a habit in prayer which our pen revolts to notice; to sit lazily upon the seat, and lay one's head cozily upon the back of the seat in front, whilst the minister, and perhaps a few earnest Christians are upon their knees, imploring God to have mercy upon such wretches! And oh! tell it not among the heathen that hundreds and thousands of professing Christians in various denominations of this blessed land, adhere stubbornly to this disgraceful, God-defying habit! To our mind there is nothing more disgusting and revolting than to see a member of the church, one who professes to follow Jesus, too proud or too lazy to kneel in prayer in public worship! And we have no words to express our astonishment at a ministry too effeminate to venture one earnest rebuke of such public irreverence toward God, and abuse of reason and nature in the house of the Lord!

We have in our observations seen enough of fallen humanity to confirm the Psalmist's declaration that it is the scorner who "sitteth in the seat of the scornful." Mockers of religion universally sit while Christians are upon their knees in prayer. We have seen, on the other hand, that all true and devoted followers of Jesus find it almost instinctively proper to approach God kneeling in prayer, while those who are in a back sliding condition, hesitate and finally remain sitting. We know some classes, too, in which sitting and praying was the decisive step in going back again into the Egypt of sin, and vice versa where kneeling was the decisive act in coming out of the world upon the Lord's side.

We have already shown that sitting in prayer is neither scriptural, rational, nor proper; and we add now emphatically that it is heathenish.

The learned theologian Casper Colver, in his "Circhlichen Ritual," says: "Numa, the founder of the Roman religion, made an ordinance that the worshipers of idols should sit in prayer, wherefore Tertulian, the church father, takes those Christians who in their worship imitate this heathenish practice severely to task, as follows:

"As the heathens pray to their idols in a sitting posture, it is censurable already, because it is an idolatrous fashion. Added to this is the crime of irreverence, which even then heathen ought to see, if they had only a little sense, for it is irreverent to sit in the presence of one whom we profess to fear and revere above others. And how much more must such a behavior in the presence of the living God be irreligious; it being, as it were, insulting God by a practical expression that prayers to him are tiresome and wearying!" Christian! KNEEL WHEN YOU PRAY!

The Living Epistle.

Laws Relating to Newspaper Subscriptions and Arrearages.

2. If subscribers order the discontinuance of their periodicals, the publishers may continue to send them until all arrearages are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their periodicals from the office to which they are sent, they are held responsible until they have settled their bills, and ordered them discontinued.

4. If subscribers move to other places without informing the publishers, and the papers are sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have decided that "refusing to take periodicals from the office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

6. Any person who receives a newspaper and makes use of it, whether he has ordered it or not, is held in law to be a subscriber.

7. If subscribers pay in advance, they are bound to give notice to the publisher, at the end of their time, if they do not wish to continue taking it; otherwise the publisher is authorized to send it on, and the subscribers will be responsible until an express notice, with payment of all arrears, is sent to the publishers.

Miscellaneous.

AT HOME.

—Four car-loads of Russian immigrants passed through Waterloo, Ga., on Wednesday, bound for the western part of the State.

—A new service was made on Brigham Young in the divorce case Aug. 5. The case will be argued before Judge Emerson.

—An explosion occurred at the Diamond mines of the Wilkesbarre Coal and Iron Company, Aug. 4, by which two men were killed and two injured.

—A terrible accident occurred at Butler Aug. 4th on the farm of William Preston, by which three men were burned to death. They were boring for oil, and were in the well at the time oil was struck. It scarcely reached the surface before taking fire, blazing up for a distance of 100 feet or more. Great excitement prevailed.

—Judge Hogan, of Ann Eliza Young's counsel, authorizes the SUN to deny the report that they have withdrawn from the divorce suit. The case is, however, much mixed up through the influence of Ann Eliza's father. Mr Young has compromised with the prophet for $5,000 down and $10,000 within ninety days. General Maxwell, her next friend, and her lawyers, who are made parties to the suit, refuse to accept her compromise, and the case will go on to-morrow. Brigham Young's counsel made an attempt to quash the proceedings to-day on technical grounds but failed. It is asserted that Mrs. Young's first husband is still alive, and that she never was divorced from him.

—The TIMES special from Coffeyville, Ks., says information reached that place that the Cherokee Indians were having bloody war among themselves at Cody's Bluff, about twenty-five miles south of there. The trouble grew out of an election held Aug. 4, in which what is known as the Ross faction came out ahead. The other two factions are termed Independent and Downings. All parties are determined, and the probability is there will be a bloody war yet.

The latest report says about seventy-five armed men of the Ross faction are laying quiet and awaiting orders. Their opponents declare a determination to continue the fight.

—Long Island City was shaken as though by an earthquake, by the explosion of two tank-boats lying opposite to Rockfellow's Long Island City Oil-Works. In less than three minutes flames had communicated to the material stored in the yards and three square blocks were enveloped in flames. The intense heat thrown out by the highly inflammable material would not admit the firemen to approach within a block and a half of the scene, while the thick smoke was insupportably suffocating at a greater distance Capt. Meyers, of one of the tank-boats, and a number of others were killed by the explosion, and a great number of boatmen near the scene were compelled to jump into the river in order to escape roasting alive. The Long Island City Oil Works, Standard Oil Works, Lowenstein's varnish factory, and other buildings were destroyed. The fire is still burning to-night. Loss is not yet ascertained.

ABROAD.

—The cholera is raging in the State of Chiapas.

—A dispatch from Vienna Aug. 5, says the Count De Chambord received the Count of Paris.

—The French troops entered Nancy Aug. 5, and were received with wild enthusiasm by the citizens.

—The great Tepic Chief Lasedo has been captured and shot by the Government forces in Mexico.

—A bill has been introduced in the Cortes providing for the establishment of a penal colony on one of the Ladrone Island.

—The Carlists claim a victory at Elgnet, in Guipuzcoa. They state that they captured one Republican General and 600 prisoners.

—Ex-President Thiers assures his republican friends that they need have no fear that a fusion of the Bourbonists and Orleanists will be effected.

—London papers state that reports from the agricultural districts of England are generally favorable to the hopes of an early and plentiful harvest.

—Emigration from Russia to America is increasing. Four hundred Russians sailed Aug. 5 on one steamer. The movement threatens to depopulate some districts in Russia.

—A statement made by the Minister of Finance shows a great increase in the number of vessels engaged in commerce between Italy and the United States. The duty on raw material is officially abrogated.

—The German Government has instructed its representatives in Spain to co-operate with the English and French representatives for the protection of foreigners and their property, even if force has to be employed.

— Mail advices from Cuba states that a severe engagement has taken place at Barancas, nine leagues from Manzanillo. The Spanish loss was severe. Thirty-seven wounded were taken to Manzanillo, and twenty more, severely wounded, were left at Veguita.

—The REPUBLICAN of Aug. 5 says: "It is stated that a movement is on foot in Cuba in behalf of Don Carlos. If this be true complications may arise which the insurgents may take advantage of, and possibly our Government will be called upon to interfere in the interest of commerce and humanity.

—On the evening of June 29, a terrible earthquake occurred in Belluna, Italy, carrying death to many, and consternation to all. The dead are counted by tens, and the material injury done by millions. Every fourth or fifth building is made uninhabitable. The principal monuments are overthrown or seriously injured. Everywhere the cry of anguish is raised, and seeks for prompt and effectual relief.

Correspondence.

Minn. Annual Conference and Campmeeting.

The annual conference of Advent Christians of Minnesota, will convene at Cheatham's Grove, in Utica, Winona Co., Minn., (in connection with the annual camp meeting,) on Wednesday, Sept. 10, at 2 o'clock p. m. Preaching brethren from a distance are expected to be present; among them Br. and Sr. Mansfield, from Chicago.

Now, my brothers and sisters, shall this meeting prove a success? If this be your desire, let an earnest effort be made in every part of this state, in northeastern Iowa, and western Wis., to come to this conference and camp meeting. The conference will be one of importance to plan for the future, and transact business which will interest every Adventist in the state.

Every preacher in the conference should be present, or report by letter in time for the conference to the secretary at Utica, Winona Co., Minn., or they forfeit their right to a certificate of membership. Every church should send delegates—one for every eight members—or report by letter.

As to the time of their organization, by whom organized, their present membership, increase since last conference, prosperity, etc., and all other matters of interest in connection with the church. Brethren, I do beseech you not to fail in this matter, and if you love the cause you will not. Will you do it? God help you.

Br. Miller will be present with the state tent, and there is a good building on the ground; but we want every church that can to bring a tent with them—bring your bedding and provision enough for yourselves, and some for strangers. Come prepared to stop over two Sundays. Consecrate yourselves anew before starting. Don't come to hear big preaching, but come to work for God in the salvation of souls. Bring your unconverted friends and neighbors with you, and work for their salvation. Let prayer be offered in every church in the state for this camp meeting to prove the best we have ever held in the state, and that a large number may be brought to Christ and prepared for his coming.

S. C. Wellcome, Sec.

From M. E. Orr, Reading, Mich.

Brethren and sisters, you have read the call in the last Times, for immediate action in regard to the indebtedness of our Publishing Society. Now, are we going to respond at once, by sending in our pledges, or what, in my humble opinion would be still better, let every subscriber send one dollar to Br. Tucker; by so doing no one will be burdened, and the debt which has hung like a cloud over our heads so long, can be lifted at once. No need of waiting until the first of January. "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." We have no promise of the morrow; therefore, whatsoever our hands find to do, let us do with all our might, for soon the night cometh in which no man can work." Inclosed is one dollar toward paying the debt. Who will be the next to respond?

From Hannah Gurnsey, Marysville, Marshal County, Kan.

I have taken The Times six years; it has been teacher and preacher, and I long for its coming each week, for it is a present help in time of need. It gives light on the pure word of God. O how I love to read the letters from brethren and sisters scattered over the land; although strangers, yet we are one in Christ, and I love to hear of the prosperity of Zion. There is nothing that can give us lasting happiness but the true religion of Jesus. I want to live nearer to him, bless his holy name, for he is good; and "his mercy endureth forever." I am still living two miles north of Marysville, Kansas, where there are none of like faith. Would be happy to have any Adventist come and break the bread of life to this people, or visit us.

From E. B. Scott, Mich.

There is a man traveling in northern Mich. who claims the name of "Rev." S. H. Smith, of New York; claims that he has traveled more miles and preached more sermons than any other man in the United States: he claims to be an Adventist preacher. But by conversation with him and hearing him preach, I find he knows but little of our views. He is now visiting our churches in northern Mich., and begs for money wherever he goes. He claimes he was robbed on the cars, of sixty dollars. Who knows?

[If he has traveled so much, and preached so long among our people, we ought to remember him, but cannot recall his name. If this amount of preaching was done before joining us, if he has joined, he ought to carry a certificate from some conference into new fields, where he is not known. Ed. Times.]

From Amos Sanford, Columbus, Kan.

The work in Kansas is progressing. Br. Smith is doing a good work for the Lord with the mission tent, assisted by Eld. E. N. Bliss and Br. D. O. Amos. Br. and Sr. R. F. Clark have left all, to go out and preach "this gospel of the kingdom." They formerly lived in Lowell, Mass., and have been in Kansas three years. Sr. Clark delivered four discourses at this place, closing last night. That she is called of the Lord there is no doubt. Never have our people listened to the pres[illegible] word with such profound attention as did last night, to her sermon upon the restitution. She held her audience spell-bound, as it were, for more than two hours, and none seemed weary. The Lord gives her utterance. She and her husband provide their own team, pay their own expenses, and are expecting pay when Jesus comes. Brethren and sisters let us help them pay their expenses, at least, that they may not grow weary in well-doing. The brethren and sisters are arranging for a general camp meeting, to commence on Thursday, the 18th day of September, 1873, near the residence of Br. Smith's, six miles east of Arvonia, Osage county, on the River Maries des Cygnes, further notice of which will be given by the committee. The mission tent will be on the ground, but all who "love his appearing" are requested to provide themselves with tents and provisions to last over two sabbaths. Shall we not have the presence of Br. Sheldon upon that occasion?

From Phebe M. London, Havana, Minn.

Myself and family are all the Adventists in this place, and we have but little preaching of the same precious faith. Br. E. Himes preached here twice, and Br. S. C. Wellcome a number of times, but few came out there being so much prejudice. On my way to camp meeting in June, I met Sr. H. M. Dubey, of Castle Rock. I invited her to come here and preach to us. She came July 16, and held two meetings in a school house five miles east of Owatonna, in a farming community. The house was filled with attentive listeners, many came out of curiosity to hear a lady preacher. Wednesday evening her subject was repentance. Friday evening the second coming of Christ. Many tears were shed and much prejudice removed; to God be all the glory. After meeting many came to the desk and gave her the friendly hand, and said "these sermons are just what we have needed a long time," and invited her to come again. We expect her again Aug. 17, and I hope and pray that some will come over on the Lord's side and be saved in his kingdom,

"Over the river where the fields are all g[illegible]n."

If there is one thing on earth that I love to hear preached it is the coming of the Lord; for his coming is nearer than when I first believed. I for one want to see him come in all his beauty, when Gabriel shall sound his trump to waken our loved ones that sleep under the cold clods of the valley. I think there will be a mighty shout go up to him who hath ransomed us from death and the grave. I believe God is marching his hosts to stand on Mount Zion, and the last chords of the gospel harp are being tuned, and Jesus is coming soon in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, and shall I, a poor unworthy worm of the dust, be saved in his kingdom? By the grace of God assisting me, I'll meet you over the river,

"Where the surges ne'er roll,
Where in the bright forever
Sorrow ne'er shall press the soul."

I am poor in this world's goods, but if any of our traveling preachers come this way, give us a call. I have a little chamber, stool, and candle, and they can rest their weary limbs from the toils of the day.

From J. C. Smith, Ripon, Labette Co., Kan.

Dear Editor and all the readers of The Times, our tent meeting at this place has closed with good results, and an impression left that will last to the judgment. The people have been stirred up all through this vicinity; many see things altogether different from what they have been taught. The dear Bible light shines out bright and glorious. The Lord gives the victory, and to him be all the praise. Our meeting of a week, at Chetopa, redounded to the glory of God. Two were baptized at this place, and others are inquiring the way. We had a precious season at "communion;" many from the different churches united with us, and thirty or forty arose, desiring to be remembered in the kingdom of God. By a little labor and effort many from other churches would unite with us, and have already, in faith. And the call is for more laborers. Here we appointed a meeting for every Sunday at Sr. Davis' house. She is one of the jewels of the Lord. Her house is called the "Traveler's Home," and there we found a pilgrim's resting place. The Lord reward this sister for her kindness to the laborers in the Lord. A week ago we came to this place and found a home with Br. Suckey and family. He came to Chetopa while we were having meetings there, and although he belongs to the Methodists, yet he gave us a hearty invitation to come to his place and pitch our tent on his land; and, since we came, he has borne the burden of the meetings, many coming to the meeting having no provisions were provided for and gladly received. Capt. Davy, from Indian Territory, with family, and a colored preaching brother, by the name of Parks, rode fifteen miles after preaching, and were with us yesterday evening. Since our visit in the Nation, last winter, the Lord has been doing a good work. The captain's wife has taken a decided stand, and contends for the faith. They are very anxious that we should go into the Nation [illegible] the tent, but our work in Kansas will not allow us. There are some desiring to be baptized there, and the captain, I think, would build a house for worship on his own land. They are very anxious for help. O that more laborers may be sent forth. Many rose last evening desiring to be saved when Jesus comes. They want us to stop longer, but we are unable to do so as there are many places yet to visit, and the time is limited. Brn. Iris and Stephenson have been with us some. I do hope they will take up the cross and move in the Master's service. Dear Br. Bliss also, is with us to labor in the gospel. He has been through many hardships and trials, yet through them all the Lord has brought him safe, and I do pray that those that have two coats will send him one. Dear brothers and sisters, you that are able, please lend a helping hand in this direction; you will be lending to the Lord and giving to the poor. No one knows what the servants have to go through in this western wild; our expenses are far more than what we collect for the tent movement from place to place. Now, brethren at the west, you that are able, remember what the Lord has done for you, and will you not help others? Those that want tent meetings please direct to J. C. Smith, Arvonia, Osage county, Kan. Our next meeting will be held at Attumwa, Coffee county, Kan., commencing the first of August. Pray for us, one and all, that we may have wisdom, might and power to do all things through Christ, and that a company may be raised up to meet him when he comes "without a sin offering unto salvation."

Believing and Speaking.

What a splendid thing life is when consecrated to the maintenance of Divine truth against all errors of false philosophy, vain tradition, mediæval darkness, and priestly corruption! And such a life rises into the sublime when the advocate knows that the course he has adopted imperils his secular interests, and involves the loss of some of the dearest social and Christian friendships. Where should we all have been to day if no such moral heroes had ever appeared in the world? Our obligation to the dauntles witnessess that stand along the highway of history, like God's pillars of fire in the moral wilderness, is simply incalculable. Friendship urged them to avoid the path of danger, but their grand reply was, "We believe, and therefore speak." A model man among this elect army of warriors for eternal truth said to a company of well meaning friends: "What mean ye to weep and to break my heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus." On another occasion the same champion of Christian fidelity said, "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God." It is not much to our credit that we can fervidly eulogise the courage and self-sacrifice of the illustrious Paul, and yet keep quietly in the background with some priceless truth locked in our breasts, lest coming to the front to proclaim it should bring us into trouble—trouble, be it noted, which, at the worst, must be gentle as a zephyr compared with the storms he endured for the Master's sake. Our praise of the patriot-soldier who dares the cannon's mouth for the honor of his country is not worth much if we are conscious of a cowardice which would have made the thing impossible in our case. Indeed, after all, it may well be questioned whether men who risk nothing for the redemption of a Christian truth that has been taken captive by paganism are either intellectually or morally capable of appreciating the splendid bravery of the apostle Paul. In sober truth, they are not. We cannot heartily admire, for we cannot even understand, a quality in another man of which we have nothing ourselves. It is easy to compose rounded orations on some of the great generals of the Christian army that sleep in Jesus until the morning of crowns and scepters dawns with the coming of the glorious Generalissimo, but it is quite another thing so to enter sympathetically into their very souls as to go forth as they did to danger and death that the truth of Christ may be preserved from the sacrilegious touch of the foe.

O that men who believe would also speak! Love of ease, love of gain,—no wonder that we have apostolic warnings against these insidious enemies of everything grand, noble, heroic, and Christ-like! Look at the church: but we shall borrow the description given by One against whom such an accusation will not be brought: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot. I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue the out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see."

There is another great doctrine of Scripture, long hidden from the churches by unscriptural teaching, the avowal of conviction regarding which, by all who believe it, would be of immense importance both to the general interests of truth and a healthy tone of religion. We refer to the promised return of our Lord to raise and glorify his body the church, to put down all anti-christian powers, and to establish his kingdom upon the earth. This doctrine, so manifestly interwoven with the prophecies of both Testaments, so coherent with the designs of the present and previous dispensations, and so necessary to the ultimate subjugation of all things to the Son of man and the development of his kingly work, has been neutralised by the theory that the conversion of all nations to the Christian faith, in the absence of our Redeemer, is the divinely prescribed work of the Christian church. That this theory is a pure assumption, without warrant in the Scripture, and without analogy in God's dealings with mankind, has been repeatedly shown in the pages of this magazine, as well as in other publications; and the palpable and confessed failure of Christian missions to realize the sanguine hopes of some of their advocates is a collateral proof that the theory has no foundation in the purposes of heaven. For, if it had such foundation, it is inconceivable that the results of evangelistic labor at home and abroad would be so remarkably disproportionate to the toil and cost. Let no one infer from these remarks that we are indifferent to Christian missions, or forgetful of the Lord's command to preach the gospel to every creature. The inference would be illogical so far as the remarks are concerned, and very unjust to us. For many years missionary work has had the writer's warmest advocacy and his humble pecuniary help. Upon Christian missionaries he has ever looked with peculiar interest and deep brotherly affection. He looks upon them as doing exactly the work the Lord intended—instrumentally gathering out of the nations God's elect ones, who are to constitute the church of the first-born. What we object to in connection with this matter is the systematic advocacy of missions by a fallacious argument. It is urged that they are to convert the world to Christ. They will do no such thing. It is said that the Lord's commission means that. It means no such thing. And it is argued that many a glowing prophecy points to their complete success. Not one of the prophets has a line to that effect. No; under the present dispensation, while Israel is away from his land, a wandering exile in every nation, and the King of Israel is in a far country waiting for his kingdom, it has pleased the Father, in accordance with the infinitely wise purpose which he kept secret for many ages, to choose out of all nations, peoples, and tongues a certain number of persons to constitute the church, the body of Christ, through which he is to fill all things and accomplish God's magnificent purposes of love to the universe.

Now, one of the results of an examination of Scripture teaching on this subject, and a comparison of that teaching with the effects of missionary labor, has been the conviction of many minds that the popular argument touching the conversion of the world is untenable. It is felt that there is a fallacy somewhere. Men who would not hear us some years ago, and who smiled at "Millenarianism" as a piece of fanaticism which strikes at the root of all practical exertion for the diffusion of the gospel, are quite prepared to listen to us now, as having, after all, something to say which may be worth hearing. In courteous society, allusions to the Chiliasts are not now the signal for merriment, or the quotation of stupid anecdotes manufactured by people with more time than wisdom, and more profanity than piety. Thoughtful men are beginning to doubt, and more than doubt, whether the inhabitants of the world will ever be evangelized by existing agency. But with all this, the deeply-rooted prejudice against the doctrine of the Lord's personal return deters them from looking the matter fairly and fully in the face; and in some cases where this prejudice has been manfully conquered by the desire to ascertain the truth, and where, consequently, the enormous mass of evidence is found in favor of the advent whilst the world is still far from God, the conclusion reached is lodged in the breast, like that on the doctrine of natural immortality; because to preach it would disturb the minds of the people and the peace of the minister.

It is impossible that silenced conviction can have a healthy effect. When God imparts a truth to a man, it is that he may proclaim it. Light is not given to be put under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and he who expects faithfulness in his stewards is not likely to entrust them with any fresh discovery if from any motive whatever, they keep back that which he has already made known to them. Let brethren who begin to see that the coming of Jesus Christ in glory must antedate the age of the world-wide light and loyalty,—so certain is this fact, that, instead of waiting for a "converted world," the early Christians hoped he would return in their day,—search dilligently what men under the Spirit's teaching say about the kingdom and reign, and they will find a flood of beauty and glory fitted to bless and gladden both themselves and their hearers. The doctrine of the Lord's second advent is the solvent of many a difficulty in relation at once to theology, the church, and the world; for associated with the predictions of the advent are prophetic descriptions of events which are actually around us at this hour. We need not be "in darkness." The state of to-day's Christiandom is faithfully portrayed in our New Testaments. Nothing that occurs in churches or nations, in the regions of theology or the speculations of the philosopher, need disturb the man who is looking for the Lord from heaven.

The doctrine was intended to have, and it has, this effect on those who firmly grasp it. And no wonder; for it is the gospel of the resurrection, of eternal life, of incorruptibility, of fullness of joy, of the deliverance of creation from bondage, of a healthy and fruitful earth, of a free and righteous people on every shore, and of the glorious reward of our Elder Brother and Head, the adored and adorable Christ of God! Why, men who see this as the seers of both Testaments did must preach it. If they were at liberty to be silent they could not. It is such "good news" in every direction. All round it beams of light point—to the church, to the nations, to the material creation, to the grave, and to the opening heavens, through which "the King of glory" returns to take his people to himself and to enter on possession of his inheritance. Preach it? Why, yes, if our preaching is to be apostolic in its fundamental doctrines; in its motives to duty; in its reasons for faith and patience under trial; in its arguments for entire consecration to the Lord; and in its hopes of complete deliverance from every spot and wrinkle, and complete victory over every foe. If our congregations "do not like the doctrine," it is a proof that their Christian education has been neglected, and the sooner they are put upon a course of Scriptural training the better both for themselves and others; and if we suffer for preaching it, we shall have the support of a peaceful conscience, whilst our reply to those who oppose will be, "We believe, and therefore speak."

[THE END.]

The Fullness of Christ.

The happiness we derive from creatures is like a beggar's garment—it is made up of pieces and patches, and is worth very little after all. But the blessedness we derive from the Savior is single and complete. In him all fullness dwells. He is coeval with every period. He is answerable to every condition. He is a physician to heal, a counselor to plead, a king to govern, a friend to sympathise, a father to provide. He is a foundation to sustain, a root to enliven, a fountain to refresh. He is the shadow from the heat, the bread of life, the Morning Star, the Sun of Righteousness; all, and in all. No creature can be a substitute for him, but he can supply the place of every creature. He is all my salvation, and all my desire; my hope, my life, my glory, and joy.

Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee. My flesh and my heart faileth, but thou art the strength of my heart and my portion forever. I cannot be exposed, I cannot be friendless, I cannot be poor, I cannot be fearful, I cannot be sorrowful, with thee. —Sel.

Providence.

Voltaire boasted that he would exterminate Christianity, and would "crush the wretch," as he impiously termed its Author. But after Voltaire had died, a Protestant church was erected over his grave, and the religion of Christ was preached over his ashes, while the same printing-press which once sent forth his infidel tracts and books, was used in printing the Bible, and in publishing the glad tidings of that gospel which he labored in vain to destroy. When the apostate Julian, in defiance of Divine prophecy, and that he might prove it false, undertook to rebuild Jerusalem, his building materials were scattered by a storm, attended by an earthquake; and when he repeated the impious attempt, even Gibbon admits, and records as an undoubted fact, that streams of fire burst forth from the earth upon his workmen, scorching some and destroying others, so that the attempt had to be abandoned.

An insult offered to a hot-headed monk, while on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, raised him to preach the Crusades which changed the whole aspect of Europe, not to say of the world. The simple circumstance of cutting a few letters on the bark of a tree, and then impressing them on paper, suggested the art of printing. The discovery of a boy who was amusing himself with two spectacle glasses, led to the invention of the telescope, that magnifier of God's glory as seen in the heavens. And to the mere falling of an apple are we indebted for the discovery of the law of gravitation, by which the millions of rolling worlds are guided, in part, in their ceaseless course through space. —Sel.

Have You been with Christ To-Day?

As the Israelites knew by the radiance of the face of Moses that he had been with God on Mount Sinai, so should men know by our spirit, conversation and practice in every-day life that we have "been with Jesus"—talking to him in prayer and listening to his voice in the Holy Scriptures. The Rev. Andrew A. Bonar, of Scotland, beautifully illustrates and enforces this point in one of his works thus:

"In the days when the Mosque of Omar was first built, over that spot of Moriah where the worshiper could touch a piece of the unhewn original rock of the hill, it was customary to bring loads of incense and all aromatic shrubs into the shrine, which was called Sakhrah. As a consequence, if any one from the city had been worshiping there, he carried away with him so much of the fragrance of the place, that when people passed him in the market place of Jerusalem, or in the streets, they used to say to each other, 'He has been in the Sakhrah to-day!' Would to God we thus lived, coming forth daily with our 'garments smelling of the myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, from the ivory palaces.' With fresh holiness every day, drawn from Christ, what witnesses for him should we be! How joyfully should we listen to the loving voice that is ever calling, 'Be holy, for I am holy;' and he who speaks thus would hasten to give us more and more when we repair to him.

"We are 'looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God.' (2 Pet. 3: 12.) Now, is it not written, 'When we shall see him, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is; and every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure?' (John 3: 2, 3.) That day approaches. Therefore, beloved, seeing that we look for such things, and seeing that all present things shall so soon be dissolved, 'what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?'"—Advent Herald.

"Unequally Yoked."

2 Cor. vi. 14.

Believers who are thus yoked are required to come out and be seperate, with the promise that the Lord will receive them, and be a Father unto them, and they shall be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. To apply this yoke to the marriage bond implies that every believer should separate from his, or her, unbelieving companion. But marriage is not named in the connection, and speaking of that in 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11, Paul wrote: "And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband. But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband: and let not the husband put away his wife." And Christ allowed but one cause for putting away a companion and marrying another. Matt. v. 32. If the apostle was speaking of church relationship, will it not mislead to apply it to marriage?—P. What The Birds Said.

BY ANNA BOYNTON AVERILL

In the elm-shaded street,
  Broad, and dewey, and cool,
Loitered two little feet,
  On the way to school.

Two little wondering eyes
  Watched the swift wings fly
Into the free blue sky
  From the elm-tops high.

"Heigh ho! the fields are fair,
  And the woods, and the swinging brooks,
And the birds are free in the air," he said:
  "What do I care for books?"

And a dozen saucy birds
  Sang loud their mood to share,
Loud, bold, and clear, the words,
  "Tu whit! what do we care?"

Then came another day,
  Fair, and sunny, and sweet,
And over the shaded way
  There came the little feet.

But O, 'twas a rueful face,
  With eyes and cheeks aflame,
Where tears had left their trace,
  And penitence, and shame.

"Your wings should all be clipped,
  For the wicked things you say!
I have been soundly whipped," he said,
  "Because I ran away."

And all the saucy birds
  Sang loud his ire to dare—
Sang bold and clear the words,
  "Tu whit! what do we care?"

Happy is He.

A lady reports this little incident:

Mrs. White had been spending the afternoon with me. She was not very cheerful company. Much of the time was spent in the story of her troubles, which after all seemed to me of her own making. She complained of her husband, of her children, of her pastor, and of herself.

"Oh," said Willie, after she was in the street, aren't you so glad she's gone?"

"Why, Willie?" I said.

"She is so doleful, she makes everything so dark. Is she a Christian Auntie?"

"She professes to be," I answered; but it was time to go to prayer meeting, and I said no more to Willie then about it. At prayer meeting we heard two or three men talk in a sad, dreary way, (as you have all heard persons talk in your own prayer meetings; people who make religion seem a gloomy thing.) As we walked home, Willie said, "Auntie, are Mr. French and Mr. Brown Christians?"

"I think so."

"And do they trust in the Lord? Does Mrs. White trust in him?"

"But why do you ask?"

"Because, I read in my 'Daily Food,' this morning, 'The man that trusteth in the Lord, happy is he.' They don't seem happy a bit, and I thought they couldn't be trusting in God."

Losing All.

A few years ago a merchant failed in business, and went home in great agitation. "What is the matter?" asked his wife. "I am ruined; I am beggared. I have lost my all!" he exclaimed, pressing his hand upon his forehead as if his brain was in a whirl.

"Ah!" said his wife; "I am left." "All, papa!" said his eldest boy; "here am I." "I too, papa," said his little girl, running up and putting her arm around his neck. "I's not lost papa," repeated Eddie. "And you have your health left," said his wife. "And your two hands to work with, papa" said the eldest; "and I can help you." "And your two feet, papa, to carry you about." "And your two eyes to see with, papa," said little Eddie.

"And you have God's promises," said grandmother. "And a good God," said his wife. "And heaven to go to," said his little girl. "And Jesus, who comes to fetch us there," said his eldest.

"God forgive me!" said the poor merchant, bursting into tears. "I have not lost my all. What are the few thousands, which I called my all, to these most precious things which God has left me?" And he clasped his family to his bosom and kissed his wife and children with a thankful heart.

Ah! no, there are things more precious than gold and bank stocks, valuable as these may be in their place. When the Central America was foundering at sea, bags and purses of gold were strewn about the deck as worthless as the merest rubbish.

"Life, life!" was the prayer. To some of the wretched survivors, "Water, water!" was the prayer. "Bread, bread!"—it was worth its weight in gold, if gold could have bought it.

The loss of property must not cloud the mind with a wicked forgetfulness of the greater blessings which are left behind. No man should despair; for no man has lost his all until he has lost his integrity, lost the mercy of God, and lost his hope of heaven at last.—Our Paper.

Why Are Mountain Tops Cold.

There is a story told of a squirrel which, discontented with the cold valley where he had his home, set out to reach a mountain top, where, thought he, the climate must be warm and bright, since that spot is so much nearer the sun, the great source of heat. But on reaching the long wished for height, he found that although the sun shone with clearer light, yet the cold was more intense than in the humble home he had left behind. He was well nigh frozen to death, and quickly and wisely resolved to return to the valley whence he came.

The process of reasoning which led poor squirrel into such difficulty and danger seems correct enough. The only trouble with it is, that, like a great many fine-spun theories, it does not agree with the facts in the case.

How happens it, then, that the nearer we go to the sun, the source of heat, the colder we find the air? It is because the sun's rays of heat pass through transparent bodies, like air, without heating them. The heat of the sun passes directly down through the air till it strikes the surface of the earth, which is warmed by it. The air becomes warm only by contact with the warm earth, and by the radiation of heat from the earth.

But why does not the mountain top become warm, and impart its heat to the surrounding air? The answer is that so great is the body of cold air around it, in comparison with its own size, and so constantly is the air around it changed by the strong winds which blow there, that not enough heat can be accumulated in the air to become sensible.

But why does not the air which is heated by contact with the surface of the earth at the level of the sea, rise to the mountain tops and warm them up, just the same as the heated air in our rooms rises to the ceiling, and makes our heads warm while our feet are cold? It does thus rise, indeed; but as it rises it also expands, because it is not so closely pressed by the air above it. So by the time it reaches the top of Mount Washington, what was a single room full of comfortably hot air, has expanded to the size of a whole house; and as it has received no more heat in its ascent, it has become very uncomfortably cold. The heat which was sufficient to make it feel warm when it occupied a small space, becomes quite insensible when it expands to a hundred or it may be a thousand times the size it was before. It is just like a moistened sponge, from which water drops when it is squeezed in the hand, but which appears quite dry when suffered to expand to its full size.—Sel.

SOMETHING FOR ALL TO DO.—"Sir," said a boy, "do you want a lad to work for you?" "No," answered the man, "I have no such want. The boy looked much disappointed—at least the man thought so—and he said in a friendly tone, "Don't be discouraged." "Oh, no, sir," replied the boy cheerfully, "I still hope on, because this is a very big world, and I feel certain God has something for me to do in it.

Obituary.

HURLBUT.—Died, July 5, 1873, in the town of York, Wis., Lydia Hurlbut, wife of Eld. Augustus Hurlbut. Aged, 80 years.

Her husband preceded her in death two years. They embraced the Advent doctrine in '43, and died in the blessed hope.

They sleep, and the grave now covers their forms,
They heed not, they feel not either trials or storms;
But their eyes were both fixed on that glorious morn,
When in triumph they'll laugh the proud monarch to

ISAAC ADRIAN.

WILLIAMS.—Died, at Clear Lake, Iowa, July 17, '73, of cholera Abraham Williams. Aged, 66 years, 1 month, and 20 days.

Sermon by the writer from Job 14. 14, 15.

PETER S. W. DEYO.

WHITE.—Died, in Pike Co., Mo., July 23, 1873, Chas. H. White, of Consumption. Aged, 29 years and six months.

Br. W. united with the Baptist church in 1867, embraced the second advent doctrine soon after, including the non-immortality of the soul and the final destruction of the wicked. His faith and hope was briefly expressed in an extract from his letter in THE TIMES of May 6 inst. He was esteemed by all who knew him, of the different denominations, as he paid equal respect to all, was esteemed for his Christian deportment, intelligence and zeal in the cause of religion. In the Sunday school and prayer meeting he was always found, and ever ready to bear testimony to his faith and hope. Nearly the last words he uttered in regard to his hope was, "the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin; that blood availed for me."

On the evening of the 23, just as the family was going to supper, he remarked to those at his bedside, "I am going home," and held out his hand and shook hands with them, and then called for all the family, calling each by name, shook hands with them, and with even a smile on his death like countenance, exhorted all to be prepared to meet him in glory. He bade all farewell as if merely about to take a pleasant journey.

From that time until he died, about ten minutes after twelve o'clock, a. m., he retained his consciousness, appearing to suffer none, and gently breathed his last without a struggle, groan, or even sigh. All present remarked it was the calmest and easiest death they ever witnessed. His illness was near two years duration, previous to which he had never known a day's sickness, and was a very stout young man, full of hope and promise.

When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory. C. R. WHITE.

Book Notices, Etc.

HISTORY OF THE SECOND ADVENT MESSAGE.—The rise, progress and known results of the proclamation now called 'Second Adventism,' or, properly, the message of the immediate coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrines and messages associated with it; the misguided zeal of some of its friends, errors imbibed and taught, the efforts, bad logic, and arguments of honest opponents to overthrow it; the persecution, strategy, slander, and falsehoods of its enemies, and the wonderful success God has given it in overturning errors, and re-establishing the old fundamental truths of the Bible and primitive Christianity in the hearts of tens of thousands of Christians, sceptics, and infidels, is worthy of being published in a condensed historical form, though time should continue but a little longer.

Such a work is much needed. There are thousands now amongst us who know but little of our past views, experiences, contests, and victories; but little of the main principles which have been our guide and defense against errors old and new. There are thousands of others who are convicted of the truths which we teach, and who will be greatly benefited by such a work, giving definite forms of doctrine, much valuable information, a large amount of Bible instruction on vital points, correcting many misconceptions, slanders, and false reports. Such a work will fall into the hands of many ministers, scholars, editors, and other religious readers, to benefit them, and glorify God by the spread of his truth, to awaken sinners to prepare for the judgment.

We propose to publish such a work by subscription, when one thousand subscribers are obtained.

We shall give the chief points of doctrines originally taught forty years ago and onward, by Advent proclaimers, in America, Europe, and Asia, with biographical sketches of the pioneers; also, historical sketches of authors and editors, books and papers, missions and doctrines now taught. We shall give, in their own language, the rich experiences and new views of many who have merged from the darkness of error and false traditions concerning the millennium, the nature of man, his state in death, and future rewards, into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel hope. We shall give in plates and diagrams the symbols and periods of Daniel and John, with dates of times fixed upon which have passed, and those yet future; also tables of some of the best chronologies of the Bible, with criticisms on Egyptian, Chinese, and other heathen chronologies.

We shall call to our aid several able writers, who are qualified for such a work, shall give specimen Sermons, Essays, Lectures, and condensed reports of debates which have been held by able men; reviews of some of our chief opponents' efforts, on life, death, immortality, future punishment, and rewards. The signs of our times, and the great awakening in all Christian lands, on the subject of our Lord's personal and speedy coming, will be clearly stated.

No money called for until the book is published. It will contain 600 octavo pages, on good paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price, $3.00. The first thousand subscribers shall have it delivered to them for $2.50 each. This we can better afford to do than to await sales at full price.

All ministers, and others who will secure subscribers, shall receive a suitable prize when the book is delivered. Address, I. C. WELLCOME,
Yarmouth, Maine.

Names of subscribers received at this office.

The annual camp meeting of the Iowa A. C. Conference will be held at Manchester, Delaware county, commencing Sept. 5, and continuing over two Sundays. The camp ground is situated one mile north of the depot, on the same ground as last year. We expect a large and good meeting. Poetry.

My Cross.

It is not heavy, agonizing woe,
Bearing me down with hopeless, crushing weight—
No ray of comfort in the gathering gloom;
A heart bereaved, a household desolate.

It is not sickness, with her withering hand,
Keeping me low upon a couch of pain;
Longing each morning for the weary night,
At night for weary day, to come again.

It is not poverty, with chilling blast,
The sunken eye, the hunger wasted form;
The dear ones perishing for lack of bread,
With no safe shelter from the winter's storm.

It is not slander, with her evil tongue;
'Tis no "presumptuous sin" against my God;
Not reputation lost, or friends betrayed;
That such is not my cross, I thank my God.

Mine is a daily cross of petty cares,
Of little duties pressing on my heart,
Of little troubles hard to reconcile,
Of inward struggles, overcome in part.

My feet are weary in their daily rounds,
My heart is weary of its daily care,
My sinful nature often doth rebel;
I pray for grace my daily cross to bear.

It is not heavy, Lord, yet oft I pine;
It is not heavy, but 'tis everywhere
By day and night each hour my cross I bear;
I dare not lay it down—Thou keep'st it there.

I dare not lay it down; I only ask,
That, taking up my daily cross, I may Follow my Master humbly, step by step,
Through clouds and darkness, unto perfect day.

The New Heaven and the New Earth.

(Rev. 21: 1-4, 9-12, 21, 25-27.)

REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D. D.

The utterance of the unknown Speaker contains a beautiful twofold description of the citizen's felicity.

First, we have a positive description of what that bliss is to comprehend; and second a negative. The positive—"Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." The negative—"And there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away." We shall in the present chapter confine ourselves to the former.

The essence of this positive bliss is, yet again, to consist (in what we have had occasion to note more than once as a main characteristic of heavenly felicity set forth in previous visions), the everlasting presence and enjoyment of God himself. The holy city, new Jerusalem, descends, but it descends not alone. The name of the city from that day shall be Jehovah Shammah—"The Lord is there." The children of Zion are joyful in their King.

Farther, does not this passage seem strongly to indicate, that the great God of heaven designs to make the new redeemed earth the future abode of the Shekinah,—his own palatial residence, the special seat of his vast empire, the metropolis of eternity? "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men." Just as Jerusalem—the first Holy City—was the sacred capital, the seat of the theocratic government,—so this "holy city, new Jerusalem, the home of the church triumphant, would seem destined to be the future capital of a rejoicing universe. Jehovah is to transfer the pavilion of his ransomed world. (Ver. 5). There is the throne in the city; and he that sat upon the throne said, 'Behold I make all things new."

But we shall not further expand this thought. For, after all, the mere locality, is comparatively immaterial. More momentous, delightful, and comforting is the great truth we have found so often reiterated in these visions, as forming the main element in the bliss of the ransomed citizens—viz., that God is in their midst. Twice over in one verse is it there said, He will dwell with them:" God shall be with them:" or as that may be rendered, "He shall be God with them:"—the fully verified meaning and interpretation of "IMMANUEL" (God with us). It has been beautifully said, that just as every lovely and varied tint in field and flower is traced to the one pure, parent, colorless ray,—so every gate and jasper wall and sapphire pavement in that jewelled city, their brilliancy and glory to the altogether lovely One, "the light which no man can approach unto." Oh, wonderous assemblage! Oh, amazing honors! The tabernacle of the great God with redeemed men! As the ranks of the *un*redeemed (cherubim and seraphim) gather around the Holy City—hovering with their bright wings over the new Jerusalem—we can picture them [illegible] than the words ever bore on earth, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!"

We have room for only one other point in the suggestive themes of these verses;—the near and intimate fellowship which is to subsist between the ransomed multitude and their God, farther brought out in the additional strong and expressive language,—"And God shall wipe away all tear from their eyes." What meaneth this? Tears, we need not say, there can be none in heaven. The symbol must be explained by reference to some earthly feelings. It has been truthfully observed by an expositor of this passage—his remark, we think, furnishes the right key to the interpretation of the figure—that "the most sacred test of affection is to wipe away a tear." It is indeed the most delicate of all offices one human being can perform towards another, that of offering sympathy in seasons of tearful sorrow. The most experienced "sons of consolation" can testify, that the more they venture to come into personal contact with aching hearts, and to cross the thresholds darkened with bereavement, the more do they feel the awful solemnity of the ground; that sorrow is a thing of that exquisite tenderness that no stranger dare intermeddle with it. Every bereft spirit will respond to words of an earnest writer, who evidently know well what a sacred thing it is to give sympathy: or, in the significant figure now before us, to "wipe away a tear:"—"Oh, the preciousness of silence in the hour of heart-cutting grief! Oh, the misery of the minstrels and people making a noise; Oh, the jarring discord of voluble sympathy! Oh the bitter mockery of commonplace condolence! Oh, for those who know how to speak with the pressure of the hand; for those to whom God has given the mute eloquence of the eye; for those who do not pretend to understand our grief!" Yes, we repeat, it is no ordinary one—no ordinary friend—who can dare touch these harp strings of sorrow. There are indeed such, in seasons of deep desolation whom we love to welcome into the smitten home; there are hands we love on such occasions to press. While drawing back from the cold commonplace contact of ordinary routine sympathy, there are those to whom, in this significant language of St. John, we gratefully entrust the wiping away of the gathering or falling tear. Such, however, is the prerogative alone of true and faithful, of tried and tested friendship and love. 'Behold,' says John, in the expressive figure of this passage 'Behold the endearing relationship which will exist between God and the believer in the Holy city. They will confide in Him as lovlingly and tenderly, as the bereft one of earth who suffers the hand of human affection to wipe the tear-dimmed eye!

Are we looking for this city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God? Amid the other gorgeous symbolism, do we keep in mind that which has met us under various figures in previous descriptions, and which is suggested here under a new one,—its "street of pure gold like to transparent glass;"—that vast as are its dimensions,—a gigantic cube, lying foursquare, with gates in every quarter, wide open for the ingress of every tribe "there entereth nothing that defileth." Nations of the saved are to be welcomed in, yet there is one badge of citizenship indispensable in the case of every unit in these teeming millions;—"the pure in heart" alone can "see God." The sentinel angels at every watch-tower have the old prophetic summons addressed to them "Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in" (Isa. 26: 2). Over every entrance in the superscription, "This Gate of the Lord into which the Righteous shall enter:"—Blessed are they that do His commandments, . . that they may enter in through the gates into the city." The city which hath foundations! There are no permanent foundations for anything here. Here we have no "continuing city." Earth's most stabled social and domestic structures are sand-built, not rock built. They are at the mercy of every capricious hurricane; and death, sooner or later, will convert them into a mass of ruins. Let us seek to live under the elevating assurance, that we are the chartered, and the soon to be glorified inhabitants of this new Jerusalem: taking as our motto, "Pilgrims and Strangers on the earth," "our citizenship is in Heaven." Let us live up to our peerless privileges, as those in the future are to dwell with Him who has promised to be with us and be our God. If trial be appointed—the loss of earthly friends, earthly portions—be it ours to fall back from the wreck and bankruptcy of the present, on the glorious reversion. Let us take down our harp from the willows; and sing, it may be amid withered props and perishable refuges—amid rifled homes and falling tears and the shadows of death,—"wherefore God is not ashamed to be called our God, for He hath prepared for us a city."—Memories of Patmos.

[THE END.]

IGNORANCE of the truth, or spiritual blindness, is generally both the mother and daughter of pride.

The Coming One.

He has not come yet. Should any one ask us, Who? the answer is, The Lord from heaven. To some it is a sad reflection that he has not come ere this.

Will he come at all? Is not such an expectation a wild delusion; at least, harmless, but still a delusion? The Sacred Word settles this question. "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, will so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Acts 1:11.) "I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." (John 14:3.) After a long time, the Lord of those servants cometh." (Matt. 14:19.)

Is it right to be on the watch for him, in contradistinction to a mere belief that he is coming some time or other? In answer to this, the church sneers, or is silent. But what is the divine dictum? Jesus says: "Be like men that wait for their Lord." (Luke 12:34.) They tell us that our Lord is "death." We know better. We know well who it is that bought us. Jesus tells us "Watch." (Mark 13:35.) Jesus says, "Be ready." (Luke 12:40.) Jesus says, "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching." (Luke 13:37.) Strange. One would think it a matter of course, that he being absent, and intending to return, seems not [illegible] him. But it

Again we read, "Hope entirely (teleios, i. e., steadily, singly, absolutely, completely, altogether, as your grand object and aim), for the grace brought unto you in the apocalypse (unveiling, disclosing), of Jesus Christ." Now when the Holy Ghost thus tells us to (as we would say in our English idiom) "set all our hopes" on the coming of Jesus, objections are impotent—lighter than chaff—less than nothing—vanity.

Were it possible for anybody to be yet in doubt respecting his duty, the following would settle it. "The grace of God teaches us to live, receiving and earnestly awaiting that happy hope and manifestation of the glory of our great Saviour and God Jesus Christ." (Titus 2:12, 13.) And "we (Christians) are earnestly expecting out of heaven the Lord Jesus Christ." (Phil. 2:20.)

* * * * *

A careful and reverent reader of the Holy Scriptures easily perceives that it was the will of the Lord that his people in all ages should be left in an expectant attitude, uncertain but what he might return in the existing generation. The object plainly was to induce them to lead such a holy life, and have such aspirations, and corresponding preparations, for higher degrees of glory, as nothing but such an expectation should excite. He tells us so, indeed. For it is written: "Every one that hath this hope (of being like him at his appearing) purifieth himself even as he is pure." (1 John 3:3.) That is, he aims at the Divine model. Now, in order to keep alive this hope, it is necessary to be "waiting for the Son of God from heaven." (1 Thess. 1:10.) And in order to an intelligent and expectant waiting, there must always seem to be a possibility, and perhaps even a probability, in the apprehension of the believer, of the Lord's instant coming. At the same time it is evident that delay could not be intended to discouraging this feeling; rather, in the nature of the case, each successive year would intensify it. Our Lord has made a fearful statement of the consequences that will ensue, in the case of those servants who are induced by the disappointment of previous expectations, as well as by other causes, to say that he delays his coming. And, moreover, it is apparent on but a little reflection, that the time must come at last when the proof will be absolute. Infinite wisdom and love so arranged the matter as to leave room in all past time for such a waiting, without making statements which in any way were calculated to mislead, or compromise divine truth.

On these general grounds, a present expectation in our day, too, would be warranted.

Yet it is natural and reasonable that as the time of the end approaches, knowledge on this great subject will increase, growing out of the development of events; and also that more light will be speedily vouchsafed from above to guide inquirers who have Daniel's heart and feelings. What! should not the Lord give an intimation to his own? With reverence be it said, this would not be like him. Even of Abraham, though not immediately concerned, the Lord said: "Shall I hide from Abraham the thing which I do?" (Gen. 18:17.) The Scripture says nothing, but he revealeth his secret [illegible] the prophets." (Amos 3:7.) And there is a special promise given concerning the clearer understanding of the prophetic word in the last times, for we read (Daniel 12:9, 10), "The words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end; the wise shall understand."

Therefore we do not hesitate to assume that if we really stand on the verge of the close of the present dispensation, we have a clearer insight than the saints who preceded us.—Prophetic Times.

Motives of Gratitude.

Man, so fearfully and so wonderfully made, was not left unprotected and unprovided for, an outcast on the earth. On the contrary, by day and by night alike, an Eye has watched for his happiness that never slumbers—an arm has been stretched out for his defense that never tires. It is that arm that sustains him during the helplessness of childhood, that shields him amid the perils of youth, and props his enfeebled constitution, when sinking beneath the infirmities of age. To none are mercies conveyed by accident. It was God that kindled that sun that lights the laborer by day, and planted those stars that guard the wanderer by night. His are those showers that bring forward the harvest, and his those dews that ripen the vintage. The good and the bad alike experience his care, and subsist upon his bounty. Not even the veriest wretch can deny that God has fed and clothed him—that he has nourished and brought him up. And are there no motives in these considerations to induce rebellious man to return to his allegiance? Is God, then, a friend that may be forgotten? His mercies, too; deserve they no requital? Ah, shall this earth of ours be cursed forever with the crime of cold ingratitude?—and yonder heavens, which have witnessed God's goodness, always hear him say, in reference to the race and the abode of man: "There, in that ungrateful world, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me?"—President Nott.

Man in Death.

Review of a Sermon preached by Rev. S. Fant, Pastor of the M. E. Church, Nevada, O., by Elder E. McCulloch, Pastor of the A. C. Church, Nevada, O.

"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the Spirit shall return to God who gave it." (Eccl. 12:7.)

We now come to the raising of Jairus' daughter, "And her spirit came again, and she arose," etc. (Luke 8:55.) Nothing is here said about an immortal soul, or an immaterial spirit. The maid was dead and friends were weeping, and at the command of Jesus her spirit came again. Wakefield, an able translator, says: "Her breath came again." Also, Thompson and the Emphatic Diaglott. This makes it all plain. When the breath of life, or spirit of life returned, the maid lived again. If immortal souls come back, it is strange no record is given of it in God's word; and strange also, that they do not give some account of where they have been.

We now come to the prayer of Stephen, and also to the prayer of Christ. Stephen prayed, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." (Acts 7:59.) And Christ prayed, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." (Luke 23:46.) In answering one of the above both are answered, as both Stephen and Christ commended their spirits to God. After quoting the above prayers of Stephen and Christ, our brother says: "They commended to God the spirit, when it left the body, and entered into Sheol, the world of spirits." Hence, he says, "the existence of the spirit is not interrupted by death." The foregoing deductions have involved our brother in a great difficulty. The petition is, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." Now, God must be in Sheol to receive the spirit, or the spirit did not go where they commended it. Stephen and Christ did not commend their spirits to Sheol.

We inquire, Is God in Sheol? Let us examine and see if Sheol is the world of spirits, "that are not interrupted by death." In Gen. 42:38, we read: "Then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to [Sheol] the grave." Here we find that part of a man, which wears gray hairs, goes to Sheol. We leave it for our readers to judge whether immaterial spirits wear gray hairs or not. Again, "Let the wicked be silent in Sheol." (Ps. 31:17.) "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in [Sheol] the grave, whither thou goest." (Eccl. 9:10.) Hence, if their spirits went to Sheol they went where all is silent, and where there is no consciousness; there being no knowledge nor wisdom in Sheol. We ask again, Is God in Sheol? Nothing is said in the Bible about Sheol being the world of spirits. The Greek word Hades, in the New Testament, corresponds with the word Sheol in the Old Testament. Both have the same significations. "I have the keys of [Hades] hell, and of death." (Rev. 1:18.) Christ, by his resurrection, obtained a victory over Hades, the grave, and holds the power to give life to the dead. "His soul was not left in [Hades] hell," the grave. (Acts 2:31.) Dr. Kitto, Dr. Eadie, Dr. Campbell, and others, unite their testimony in saying Sheol and Hades, "denote the general receptacle of the dead." Stephen and Christ both uttered a reasonable request as they were being bruised, mangled and torn, with no hope of release until death should end their sufferings. They commended their life to God, the great fountain of life, and not an intimation that their spirits were going to Sheol.

We shall next notice the request of the dying thief, and the reply of the Saviour: "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." And Jesus said unto him, "Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." (Luke 23:42.) We would call special attention to the request: "Remember me when thou comest [not when thou goest], into thy kingdom." The thief understood the kingdom of Christ to be future, as his request clearly shows; and three days, after the crucifixion Christ declared "I am not yet ascended to my Father," consequently, if the thief went to heaven or paradise, if that be where God is, on the day he made the request, he went at least three days before Christ went; and we might add forty days before Christ, for Christ was on earth forty days after his resurrection. (Acts 1:3.) These facts are positive proof that Christ did not receive his kingdom on the day he was crucified; to say nothing about the punctuation of the Bible, which is no work of inspiration, and was not introduced until about the 15th century. And the comm[illegible]laced after the sentence, "I s[illegible] thee," changes the meaning, a[illegible]ings it in conflict with all the express declarations of the divine word, relative to the time of rewards and punishments.

Another Scripture is offered as proof that the soul is conscious between death and the resurrection. "But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." (Matt. 22:30–31; also, Luke 20:37, 38.) This statement of our Saviour was made for the purpose of refuting the theory of the Sadducees, that death was the endless extinction of life. The Sadducees did not believe in any future life, nor in a resurrection of the dead. (Luke 20:27.) The Saviour did not attempt to prove that the soul was immortal, or that a man could be dead, and alive, at the same time. But Christ silenced the Sadducees and proved the necessity of the resurrection, in order that the patriarchs, who were then dead, might inherit the promises made to them while pilgrims and strangers on the earth. The Saviour's argument is virtually this: Although Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are dead, yet they are not eternally dead, as you Sadducees believe; hence, he is not the God of the dead, in the Sadducees sense of death, being eternally dead; but in the ordinary sense of death he is "Lord both of the dead and living." Hence, the Apostle says: "For to this end Christ both died and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord, both of the dead and the living." (Rom. 14:9.)

This doctrine of a resurrection completely silenced the Sadducees, and they said, "Master, thou hast well said." (Luke 20:39.) Any other view of these sayings would deny that God is the God of the bodies of those old patriarchs, and it would make Christ's attempt to prove the resurrection fruitless, and give the whole argument to the Sadducees. For all admit that the body dies, and if God is not God of the dead bodies of his saints, then it follows that the dead will never be raised, for they have no God to raise them; and, as they cannot raise themselves, they must forever remain dead, and thus the Sadducees would have all the argument in their favor.

Thus we find, after a careful examination of this subject, that every attempt to prove the conscious existence of the soul between death and the resurrection is a failure, and brings a reproach upon the character and purposes of God, and robs Christ of the glory of being the life-giver, (1 John 5:11, 12), and neither finds support in philosophy, reason, nor revelation. If we should inquire, What fruit the doctrine of immortal-soulism has borne? We should find that Mohammedanism, Spiritualism, Sweedenborgianism, and Shakerism, with a host of other false systems of religion, find all their support in this doctrine, which had its origin in the saying of Satan in the garden: "Ye shall not surely die," and was afterward taught by the heathen philosophers in Egypt. Not one good fruit does this doctrine present, which is dependent upon it for its existence. Future life is gained without it, while many evil things are the result of it, and it is said that, "a tree is known by its fruit." Much better believe the word of God, which declares: "The soul that sinneth shall die." (Ezek. 18:20.) "All the wicked will God destroy." (Ps. 145:20.) And a host of other declarations which prove, conclusively, that the final end of the sinner will be the eternal extinction of conscious being. For "the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." (Rom. 6:23.)

This view does no injustice to the sinner. He refuses to obey the command of his Creator, and God turns him back to dust again. Thus, mercy and justice unite in saying, "let the sinner die;" and the voice of the eternal is heard, saying, "Let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end." Ps. 7:9.)

In conclusion, we remark, that in regard to materialism, to which our brother referred in his discourse, we boldly affirm that materialism is the only basis of the Christian's hope. All admit that if we are saved, it must be through the death of a material Christ, as an immaterial Christ could not die. Hence, the foundation and chief corner stone of the hope of the church is in materialism. And all that are saved in the world to come, will be material beings. At the coming of Christ, our material bodies will be changed and glorified. (Phil. 3:21.) Then materiality will be immortalized and glorified in the person of each saint, as it is now in the person of Christ.

We inquire, Who will object to such materialism as this? Let us bear in mind, that in order to object to it we must object to God's Son; and all who ridicule materialism must, of necessity, ridicule Christ. There are no possible means by which to evade these conclusions, while we follow the teachings of the eternal word of truth. May the Lord help us, that we may secure the favor of God, which, in its rich bestowment, will give unto us eternal life; and thus evade the terrible consequences of sin, which will result in eternal death, "For the wages of sin is death." (Rom. 6:23.)

[THE END.]

The Church.—No. 1.

C. C. M.

There is considerable variety of opinion on the "church question" among those who claim to take the Bible as the "rule of their faith and practice." Some believe in what they call "church order," or in having the church well organized in every community, by the appointment of officers, and orderly arrangement of whatever other matters may be necessary to constitute an associated band of believers, organized and set in order. Others just as sincere and devoted regard all such measures as the work of man and hence unnecessary. They consider that all who have the Spirit of God will go together and work together in harmony and peace. I find that where this diversity of opinion exists it is associated with more or less feeling. Those who believe in organization do so because they regard it necessary to the prosperity of the cause and also according to the teaching and practice of the apostolic church. It would be difficult under such circumstances to be otherwise than sensitive on the point at issue. And then those who disbelieve in organization claim the same kind and the same amount of evidence to sustain their position. So here it is. And no little injury has been done to the cause of the Master by unwisely pressing the issue where the cause is as above described.

It has occurred to me that a brief examination of the Scriptures on this subject might be of interest and profit to those who are or have been "vexed" with the question of "church order." And after having carefully examined every passage in any way relating to the subject I have finally concluded to write out a few thoughts with the prayer that the blessing of God may attend the effort and that it may be sanctified to the good of all who read. Every child of God should constantly be a seeker after the truth. Follow the truth, wherever it leads.

EKKLESIA.

This word is found one hundred and fifteen times in the New Testament. It is translated "church" one hundred and twelve times, and "assembly" three times. It occurs in the following passages: Mat. 16:18; 18:17; Acts 2:47; 5:11; 7:38; 8:1, 3; 9:31; 11:22, 26; 12:1, 5; 13:1; 14:23, 27; 15:3, 4, 22, 41; 16:5; 18:22; 20:17, 28; Rom. 16:1, 4, 5, 16, 23; 1 Cor. 1:2; 4:17; 6:4; 7:17; 10:32; 11:16, 18, 22; 12:28; 14:4, 5, 12, 19, 23, 28, 33, 34, 35; 15:9; 16:1, 19; 2 Cor. 1:1; 8:1, 18, 19, 23, 24; 11:8, 28; 12:13; Gal. 1:2, 13, 22; Eph. 1:22; 3:10, 21; 5:23, 24, 25, 27, 29, 32; Phil. 3:6; 4:15; Col. 1:18, 24; 4:15, 16; 1 Thes. 1:1: 2:14; 2 Thes. 1:1, 4; 1 Tim. 3:5, 15; 5:16; Phm. 2; Heb. 2:12; 12:23; Jas. 5:14; 3 Jno. 6:9, 10; Rev. 1:4, 11, 20; 2:1, 7, 8, 11, 12, 17, 18, 23, 29; 3:1, 6, 7, 13, 14; 22:16; Acts 19:32, 39; 41.

By consulting the lexicon it will be seen that the word denotes an assembly of any kind called together for any purpose, whatever. This is its classical use. As used in the Scriptures, in application to God's people, it denotes the congregation of the saints called together for the purpose of worshiping God and attending to the ordinances of his house. There are two senses in which this is to be understood. Speaking in a general way, the ekklesia of God is composed of all, who in every place "fear God and work righteousness." To this the Savior refers in Mat. 16:18, "And I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church: and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." But this general ekklesia (church) is divided into local ekklesiai (churches), as the "church at Cenchrea," (Rom. 16:1); "the churches of Asia salute you," (1 Cor. 16:19.) These local "churches" are only a part of the general body. They are the "churches of God," (1 Cor. 11:16,) which, when aggregated, or taken as a whole, constitute the "CHURCH OF GOD." This general body is termed by many the "invisible church." The apostle considers it the "body of Christ" of which he is the head. "And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." (Eph. 1:22, 23.)

THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

The practices, offices and nature of the church of the first century are what we need to guide us into the truth on the subject of this essay. For information on this subject the Scriptures are our chief text book. The church of the apostles' day as shown to us in the New Testament is the church that should obtain in this day. True there were certain things in the church of the first century that were purely apostolical, i. e., ceased with the apostles. For instance the office of apostleship, gift of tongues, etc. But the church in its general constitution of to-day should be the same as then. We ought to seek earnestly to get back to the "old landmarks—the usages of early Christianity. The church of that day believed in what is modernly called "church order" or else they did not. And we are not to suppose that so important a matter as this would be passed over in silence in the Scriptures of truth. If the early church believed in and practiced church order, or organization, I shall expect to find in some portion or other of the New Testament a clear reference to every constituent element in the form of that organization, and it is my hope that I may never give my sanction to any church rule or order for which I cannot show undoubted authority in that book. On the other hand if the early churches rejected all forms of organization I shall expect to find the fact clearly developed, both in its practices and in the teachings of its apostles. And if as the result of careful investigation we find this to be the case we will gladly accept and follow the truth as though it were otherwise. It is the primitive church with her practices and mode of existence as developed in the teachings of the great apostles of Christianity that we do earnestly desire to comprehend. No matter what it was we want the naked truth without regard to our former prejudices.

WHAT IS AN ORGANIZED CHURCH?

An organized church of Jesus Christ is a company of believers in Christ, banded together for the purpose of worshiping God. This will comprehend the regular or stated meeting of its members for prayer and conference or social service. Each church when properly organized will have its officers duly appointed as the word of the Lord directs. These officers are not only specified, in that word, but also their duty is made plain. Does not such organization partake of the nature of creeddom, I am often asked? There can be but one answer to this question. The Bible is our creed in one sense. We bow to its authority in all matters relating to religion. Well then in the sense in which the Bible is a creed we are in creeddoom when we are led by the Bible. So with this organization, if the Bible sustains it, then it is Bible creeddom. But there is no shadow of connection between it and human creeds, unless it's a human concern, which remains to be seen. I may remark is passing that in the above definition of an organized church there is no faith stipulated. It is simply "believers in Christ banded together," etc., of course with the understanding that Christ is their teacher and his word is to be the guide of their faith. This would seem to cut off all connection with human creeds.

The Soul Not Immortal,

AS REVEALED IN THE SCRIPTURES.

L. C. KERR.

"The Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." (Gen. 2:7.)

"The living know that they must die, but the dead know not anything; neither have they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, are now perished.... Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, (why?) for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest." (Eccl. 9:5, 6–10.) It will avail nothing to say that the body is all that is alluded to in this Scripture for, according to theologians, the body never did know anything, or think anything; but it is the mind, the intellectual part. The brain is the organ of thought, both in man and in beast, and this has been demonstrated in many ways. As an instance, the man who was struck upon the head by a falling limb from a tree, while uttering the sentence, "Hand me that wedge," remained insensible for months; when, in a surgical operation the skull was raised from the brain, consciousness returned, and instantly he pronounced the word "wedge," finishing the sentence just where we had left off. Sense was completely suspended for the time being; thus the pressure upon the brain produced entire cessation of thought. And we would inquire where was the immortal intelligence of the man during this period of time? Logically, we think there was none. We will briefly consider the case of Hezekiah and see in what light he looks at death, whether as a friend or an enemy.

In those days was Hezekiah sick unto death. And Isaiah, the prophet, ...came unto him, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live. Then Hezekiah turned his face toward the wall, and prayed unto the Lord, and said, remember now, O Lord, I beseech thee, how I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart and have done that which is good in thy sight; and Hezekiah wept sore. Then came the word of the Lord to Isaiah, saying, Go and say to Hezekiah, thus saith the Lord, ...I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears; behold, I will add unto thy days fifteen years....The writing of Hezekiah, King of Judah, when he had been sick and was recovered of his sickness, I said in the cutting off my days, I shall go to the gates of the grave; I am deprived of the residue of my years....Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter; I did mourn as a dove; mine eyes fail with looking upward....Behold, for peace I had great bitterness, but thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption....For the grave cannot praise thee; death cannot celebrate thee; they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth." (Isa. 38.) We cannot conceive of anything more absurd than to suppose that Hezekiah was just on the verge of entering into heaven, there to receive his reward—his crown of life. Why weep at such glorious tidings? It cannot be said that he expected to be punished for his sins, for he walked before God with a perfect heart, and did that which was good in his sight. Why add fifteen years of trouble and misery to one that was about to enter into life and glory, and thus keep him back from his reward? It was rather for this cause: "Because man goeth to his long home [the grave], and the mourners go about the streets." (Eccl. 12:5.) Hezekiah commences to praise the Lord in his convalescence, and thanks him for delivering his soul from the pit of corruption.

Hear Ezekiel on the subject: "Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine; the soul that sinneth, it shall die"—cease to live—perish. (Ezek. 18: 4–20.)

We come now to the New Testament, for a definition of the soul and life of man. We are sometimes met with this expression, in Matt. 10:28, "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." If there were no other scripture in the Bible to refute the argument of the soul's immortality, this would do it.

Hear the theological description of the soul: "It is without figure, form, color, impenetrability, extension, divisibility, gravitation, attraction or repulsion; it has neither exterior or interior; it is indestructible, immaterial, uncompounded and invisible."

Could such a soul be destroyed in a hell of literal fire? We think there would be nothing to destroy. And can anything immortal be destroyed? If the soul is immortal, God cannot destroy it in hell or any other place, so this passage proves too much; it proves the soul destructible, susceptible to death, and mortal, instead of being immortal.

But for the true meaning of the passage, The Saviour is here speaking of two lives, this temporal life, and that eternal life; which, he says, he "will give to every one that believeth on him." "Fear not them which kill the body," or take this life, but are not able to take the next life, which is not in the power of the assassin. In the eighth chapter of Mark we find the parallel passage: "For whosoever will save his life [or soul] shall lose it; but whosoever will lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it." The same word here rendered life is rendered soul in Matt. 10:28, and is rendered soul in the 36th and 37th verses of this chapter. They are all from the same Greek word psukee, which corresponds with the Old Testament nephesh, the Hebrew word for soul, or creature.

"A sword shall pierce through thy soul also." (Luke 2:35.) Can an immortal, immaterial, impenetrable soul be pierced with a sword? This theory, if let alone, will destroy itself. No wonder that its advocates are so reluctant to have it tried by the gospel and sound logic. Truth wants no defence.

"He seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption." (Act. 2:31.)

It could not be supposed that Christ's soul went to a burning hell [gehenna], where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched; but to the grave [hades], the unconscious state of the dead.

As our space will not allow us to test all the points we refer to, we can only make passing remarks, and merely mention some of the remaining portions of Scripture, for we do not design—since so much has been spoken and written on this subject—to make a thorough investigation of the Scriptures, but merely to bring before the casual readers some of the most important points, to show that the soul is not immortal.

"Let him know that he which converteth a sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death." (James 5:20.) This death is not a temporal death, but an eternal death; for the righteous die a temporal death just as really as the wicked, but it is the second death—the death which John speaks of when he says: "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power." (Rev. 20:6.) "And every living soul died in the sea." (16:3.) "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God....And it was said unto them that they should rest yet for a little season (how long?) until their fellow-servants also, and their brethren that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled." (Rev. 6:9, 11.) There are two things to be noticed in this last proposition:

1. These souls were seen, which does not look very favorably for the description of the soul, as it is pronounced invisible.

2. These souls were killed, from which, by any fair exegesis, there is no evading the conclusion that the soul is mortal.

After so many inspired evidences as to the nature of the soul, we think that the candid reader must concede the fact that the soul is mortal, and that when the man dies, both soul and body dies, and will remain dead until the resurrection; and then [not until then] will the saints be rewarded with eternal life. (See Luke 14:14; Tim. 4:1; Rev. 22:12), which life is about to be revealed in these last times.

Reader, may we meet there, in that kingdom, which has no end; where all is love, unity and peace is my prayer.

[THE END.]

The Doors were Shut.

A. ARMOUR.

"The first day of the week when the doors were shut, where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus and stood in the midst." (John 20:19.)

There are various views of this incident. Some think it was only what any natural man might have done—opening the door and coming in while the attention of the disciples was otherwise engaged. Others think it was a a miracle, out of the ordinary course of nature. And some believe it to be an example of the natural, or usual, power of the spiritual body.

"There is a spiritual body." "It is raised a spiritual body." (1 Cor. 15: 44.) Jesus is the "first fruit" of this resurrection (1 Cor. 15:20), and the only sample we have of the spiritual, resurrection body. The sample will surely not mislead us as to the nature and capabilities of the whole harvest.

We should expect some considerable difference between the present "natural [psychikos — soul-like, animal] body," and the future "spiritual [pneumatikos — spirit-like, or wind-like] body." We find from the sample that the difference is not in form. Jesus retains his old form. I cannot think the wounds were mere appearances, assumed for the occasion; no, "in the midst of the throne....stood a Lamb as it had been slain." (Rev. 5:6.) Neither can I believe the incident, or its narration calculated to mislead. Let us then carefully notice the inspired record. The first thing that strikes us is "doors." The disciples are assembled in a room of a house, perhaps that house mentioned in Acts 1:13, where Peter and the other apostles abode. The eastern houses had a door to the street, entering into a gateway or hall, from which access was had to the various rooms and stairways which led to the upper rooms, and to the roof, (so they could descend from the house-top and flee, through the outer door, without passing through the house; as, Matt. 24:17.)

"The doors were shut." That is, the street door, and the door into the meeting-room. "Were shut," kekleismenon, perfect participle of kleio—having been shut, closed, barred, bolted, locked. The word conveys the idea of securely fastened (see all the places it occurs, Critical Greek Concordance, p. 226.) Compare Acts 5:23; Rev. 20:3.

Again, we infer the doors were securely fastened on the inside, from the reason why they were shut—"for fear of the Jews." Having had such an experience of a Jewish mob, in the case of Jesus, they would naturally fasten the doors.

Further, we think the doors were not "on the latch," from the fact that latches seem to have been uncommon, if not unknown. "Knock, and it shall be opened," seems to be the universal rule there. (See Song 5:2–5; Matt. 7: 8; 25:10, 11., etc.) Acts 12, 13 is a very similar case to this—a meeting of the disciples, with shut doors, in this same city. Peter evidently could not enter till the door was opened from within.

Again, I infer that the doors were securely fastened, from the fact that mention is twice made that the doors were shut. (Vv. 19, 26.) Unless the doors were fastened, there is no reason why the circumstance should be mentioned.

Jesus told Nicodemus, "The wind [pneuma] bloweth where it listeth—the spirit moveth where it pleaseth ....so is every one that is born of the Spirit." This incident exemplifies and illustrates the statement.

When we bar our doors at night do we bar out the angels? Or shall we, with pitiful levity, suggest that they enter through the key-hole?

Let us have done with trifling on solemn subjects. The suggestion that, perhaps "their eyes were holden," can never account for the opening of the shut, closed, bolted, barred, locked doors.

We cannot explain how a "spirit moveth where it pleaseth," but we can believe the record, and we do know that walls and doors interpose no barrier to a spiritual being; and such was the raised Jesus, and such will be the raised saints—"it is raised a spiritual body."

A FREE pardon calls for a grateful heart.

The Christian Life.

School Life.

I sat in the school of sorrow;
The Master was teaching there;
But my eyes were dim with weeping,
And my heart was full of care.

Instead of looking upwards
And seeing the face divine,
So full of the tenderest pity
For weary hearts like mine,

I only thought of the burden,
The cross that before me lay,
So hard and heavy to carry,
That it darkened the light of day.

So I could not learn my lesson,
And say, "Thy will be done,"
And the Master came not near me
As the weary hours wore on.

At last, in my heavy sorrow,
I looked from the cross, above,
And I saw the Master watching,
With a glance of tender love.

He turned to the cross before me,
And I thought I heard Him say,
"My child, thou must bear thy burden,
And learn thy task to-day.

"I may not tell the reason,
'Tis enough for thee to know
That I, the Master, am teaching,
And give this cup of woe."

So I stooped to that weary sorrow;
One look at that face divine
Has given me power to trust Him,
And say, "Thy will, not mine."

And then I learnt my lesson,
Taught by the Master alone,
He only knows the tears I shed,
For He has wept His own.

But from them came a brightness,
Straight from the home above,
Where the school-life will be ended,
And the cross will show the Love.

A Real Saviour.

Christ, the real Saviour, came into the world to save real sinners. When Luther was under a bitter sense of sin, he said, "Oh, but my guilt is so great I can not believe that Christ can save me!"

But one who was helping much, said to him, "If thou wert only a semblance of a sinner, then Christ would only be the semblance of a Saviour; but if thou be a real sinner thou shouldest rejoice that a real Saviour has come to save thee."

If we meet with a man who says, "Yes, I am a sinner; I know I am a sinner, but I do not know that I ever did much amiss; I have always been honest and correct," such a person has a name to be a sinner, and no more. He is a sham sinner and a sham Saviour would suit him well.

But for another who confesses that he has been a grievous transgressor, there is a real Saviour. Rejoice, O ye guilty ones, that the Christ of God himself really came with real blood and presented a real atonement to take away real sins, such as theft, drunkeness, swearing, uncleanliness, Sabbath-breaking, lying, murder, and things I need not mention; even these can be blotted out by the real Saviour who has come to save the chief of sinners from suffering what is due to their sins.

Oh, that we could ring this great Gospel-bell till the hills and valleys were filled with its music! May the Lord open men's ears and hearts, that those who hear the glad tidings may accept the Saviour who has come to save them.—Spurgeon.

Are We in Earnest?

Are we doing all that lies in our power to advance the cause of Christ? Are our hearts fully in the Saviour's keeping? Do we realize the shortness of time, and the importance of working while it is day, as we ought? We talk of the soon coming of the Lord, and the necessity of preparing to meet him, but do we realize that these things are so? When I enter into self-examination, I feel that I am sadly deficient in almost everything that is requisite to perfect Christian character, yet I am unwilling to give up the struggle, knowing that the promise is only to those that endure unto the end; and I am sometimes led to cry out with earnestness of soul, "Teach me thy way, O Lord; I will walk in thy truth." Oh! for more consecration to the Master; for soon we shall be called to give an account of our stewardship; soon Jesus will come, attended by a retinue of angels, and if we hear him say, "Well done," it will be because we have done well.

Then how important that we walk in the footsteps of Him who lived our example; live out the teachings of his word, that we may, at least, have eternal life, and dwell on the earth when it is made new. How careful we ought to be that our influence is cast on the side of right; for Jesus has said, "He that is not with me, is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad." Matt. 12: 30. Sad, indeed, would it be, if, after professing to love the Lord, our lives should not correspond with our profession, and we thus bring a reproach upon the cause of truth.

Oh! for grace to be humble, "in all things showing ourselves a pattern of good works. In doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part, may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of us. "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

Then, if we are to be a peculiar people, we ought not to be conformed to this world, but be "transformed by the renewing of our mind, that we may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." If we have become addicted to habits that are injurious, been conformed to the fashions of this world, the word of God demands a reform. "He that striveth for the mastery, is temperate in all things." Oh! that we might overcome self in such a manner as to be willing to labor to elevate ourselves to the standard of truth, although it may place us under the necessity of cutting off some right-hand-sin, and crush some cherished idol to atoms. May the Lord help us to break off from every sinful indulgence, for it is our iniquities that have separated between us and our God.

May we earnestly seek to be overcomers, remembering that Jesus has said, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. 3:21.—Sel.

A CORRESPONDENT from Kansas writes: "You have no idea of the number who have come West and left their religion behind them. Worldliness paralyzes many a noble effort. People here have an old tradition that 'a man is ruined when he crosses the Missouri river.' As an index to the worldliness in some churches, I send you a circular which was distributed through the city recently.

Here is the handbill:

"EPISCOPAL FESTIVAL! this evening at Spiers' Hall. Strawberries and ice cream! Music and DANCE! Come one, come all, and enjoy yourselves."

There is always more or less lawlessness in new communities, and therefore the greater need of earnest religious effort. We doubt, however our correspondent's charitable statement that the people he describes "left their religion behind them." Their external religiousness was merely conventional—their real godlessness revealed itself as soon as it had an opportunity. Still, there is danger, even in good Christians, in the temptations and isolation of new communities, and there should be earnest missionary efforts to counteract these influences.—Christian Standard.

THREE-FOURTHS of the difficulties and miseries of men come from the fact that most want wealth without earning it, fame without deserving it, popularity without temperance, respect without virtue, and happiness without holiness.

IF we take care to keep a good conscience, we may trust God to take care of our good name.

Advent Christian Times.

WM. SHELDON, - EDITOR.

Give your Name, Postoffice, County and State every time you write.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, August 19, 1873.

BR. SHELDON left for home Saturday.

WE call the attention of all to Br. Mathewson's notice of a Board meeting. It speaks for itself.

BR. H. L. HASTINGS has requested us to say that he will be present at the Campmeeting held at Wyanet, Bureau Co., Ill.

READ the Secretary's report of the recent informal meeting held at Chicago, and think the matter over. What shall be done? and who shall do it?

WE request all who write for THE TIMES to write plainly. Hasty scribbling, which we have to guess at, is not relished by printers. Take time to re-write such articles.

ELD. G. L. TEEPLE, from the East, is now preaching in Chicago, and will visit other portions of our western field, and perhaps settle among us. He will do good wherever he settles.

WE are glad to learn that Br. J. C. Smith, of Kansas, is meeting with success in that new field. We wish the infant cause in Kansas abundant prosperity. The tent meetings being held there, appear to be arousing the people. We are requested to visit the field; possibly we may.

YOU will find enclosed in this number a blank pledge with a request that it be filled out and returned immediately. We hope this last appeal will receive your candid consideration. If the burden is made equal it will not be oppressive to any. Do all you can, and act at once. Let it not be said of the Advent people, that by their acts they deny their faith.

FIGHTING-WRITERS.—It is to be regretted that we have not more writers, who write with the sole design of feeding the flock of God with words of comfort, instead of controversy, to gratify their own carnal desire to fight somebody. We have a class of writers in our midst who deserve to be rebuked severely. Their pens are idle till they see some little point in another writer's article, out of harmony with their own views, when all at once they are filled with a spirit that prompts them to write—the spirit of fight. And then they want to fight the Editor if he will not print it.

THE secretary's notice of the Chicago gathering fails to tell its object, which was not to place the publishing interest upon a personal basis—that was simply talked up as a last resort in case all other efforts should fail—but the original object of the meeting was to get men of means together who would blot out the debt at once. Another meeting will decide the matter. All who wish to keep the paper on its present basis should act without delay. We think the basis on which we now stand will best suit the people at large. What do you think?

AN EXCHANGE gives the following courteous statement concerning our views on theology:

> "The leading points of doctrine held by the Adventists are that man is wholly mortal; that he is unconscious in death; that there will be a resurrection of all men, just and unjust; that Christ's second coming is a literal one, and it is near, but the exact time is not certain; that the earth is not to be burned up, but purified by fire, and will be the future abode of the righteous."

In this time of sectarian prejudice, which too often leads our opponents to falsify our faith, or give it an unfair coloring, such a candid statement is appreciated.

Possibility of a Resurrection.

Many short sighted speculations pass current as genuine philosophy; and when such speculations come in collision with doctrines plainly set forth in the Bible, these Bible doctrines must either be spiritualized or discarded, because, forsooth, if literalized, they are unphilosophical. Such is the course pursued of late with reference to the resurrection of the dead. From a literal standpoint it is pronounced unphilosophical, and hence impossible; and thus short sighted men attempt to reason away what God has promised. The Rev. Geo. Mott argues that even nature itself, on a limited scale, foreshadows the possibility of a resurrection, when the God of nature shall exhibit the requisite vivifying power:

> "Nature not only shows us how wonderful are the manifestations of life, she also furnishes us types and specimens of a resurrection; thus affording evidence that the thing itself is possible. There is a flower, which ....appropriately bears the name of the "Resurrection Flower." One of these has blossomed eight or nine hundred times. Similar to this is the rose of Jericho. Dried up by the burning suns and parching air of its native climate, it contracts into a ball. The wind detaches it from the spot where its slender roots had fixed it, and rolls it over the plain to indefinite distances. Thus it lies apparently dead and decaying. But when it is blown upon some spot of moisture, its roots take hold, its leaves drink up the juices of the soil, and are unfolded, and a flower like a rose opens as if awakened from sleep.
> You have noticed the roadside puddle with its countless animalculæ. What becomes of them when the water is dried up by the heat of summer? Do they perish? How is it that when the rain descends, straightway the water teems again with them? They did not perish. They dried up with the departing moisture; but their dust was susceptible of life. This has been proved by direct experiment. Take one of these, the daphnia, or water-flea, from the baked sediment. It is dry and apparently dead. Touch it with the point of a needle, and it splinters like burnt paper. Now place to it a drop of water and observe the change. As soon as the tissue become completely moistened, you notice a slight action, which by degrees increases as life is infused throughout the whole body, and you behold a heart, lungs, and intestines in action as vigorous as ever. The celebrated chemist, Ehrenberg, kept similar animals in this state three years, and then revived them by water. What is thus done in nature on a small scale, is yet to be done in providence in a stupendous manner. These are some of the hidden things of nature. Yet let us not imagine we have discovered all she has to reveal. But surely nature has disclosed enough to rebuke sternly the slowness of men to believe all that God hath written, because some things seem mysterious, and even impossible. With the daily and hourly miracles (so to call them) of the vegetable and animal world, before our eyes, with creation, renovations, transitions, innumerable going on, while yet individuality and identity are preserved, nothing ought to be thought incredible, or even unlikely, concerning the destiny of man, which comports with these wonders, and which in itself is only an analogous transformation. And yet 'our faith and hope rest upon the affirmation of heaven itself; not upon the soundness of philosophical speculations, or even demonstrations, if such could be obtained. It is not as theorists, but as believers, that we look for another life.'"

Animal Magnetism.

The following article is clipped from the Chicago Tribune, and is well calculated to illustrate the existence of a principle in human nature by which mind can impress mind, though not often so fully developed as in this case, and which cannot be fully explained:

> "The dividing line between Nature and the Supernatural is in some places very obscure. A young gentleman of the name of J. B. Brown, a resident of Red Oak, Ia., aged 21 years, called at the Tribune office in company with ex Senator Woodard, of this city, and a gentleman from Whiteside County. Mr. Brown was introduced as one possessing remarkable psycological powers, of which the assembled editors were invited to make a test. We were informed that, if any person would go to another part of the building and deposit any article whatsoever in a secret place, Mr. Brown, being blindfolded, would take the person by the hand and lead him directly to the place, the only condition being that the person depositing the article should keep his mind intently fixed upon it. One of the gentlemen of the Tribune thereupon went into an adjoining room, closed the door, and placed a coin inside a volume of the Poland Credit Mobeller report, and covered this volume with several other books. Returning, Mr. Brown, having a handkerchief tightly bound over his eyes, took this gentleman by the left hand, held the hand for a moment to his own (Mr. B.'s) head, and then walked against the door of the adjoining room. The door being opened, he marched against one of the glass doors of a bookcase having a dozen or more similar openings. This door being opened, he placed the hand of the gentleman who had secreted the coin on the Poland Credit Mobeller report, and said, "There it is." He did not claim to know what the thing was, but he knew where the place was.
> Several experiments similar to the foregoing were tried, with the invariable result that Mr. Brown, by placing the hand of the experimenter on his own forehead, was enabled to walk directly to the place where the object had been placed. It was also ascertained that if a person should merely fix his thoughts on any object in the building, Mr. Brown would go directly to it, having first placed the person's hand on his own head. The only explanation Mr. B. can give of his own powers is, that, when the hand is placed on his head, he sees a light leading to the object of which that person is thinking. He does not pretend to read anybody's thoughts in any other way than this.
> It is fortunate that Mr. Brown was born in the nineteenth century instead of the seventeenth, else he would have been burned for a witch. As it is probable that he will give some public exhibitions of his powers, we turn him over to the "scientists." That there is no humbug in his case, we are fully persuaded. The experiments to which he submitted in the office of the Tribune, in the presence of half a dozen extremely skeptical experimenters, seem to prove the existence of a physico-psychologic force, to which the name of "animal magnetism" is most commonly applied. The existence of such a force has long been suspected, but the conditions of its operation are so rare, and the means of verifying the testimony concerning it are so unsystematized, that it has no scientific basis or recognition whatever. As a starting point for some well-authenticated information upon the subject, we suggest that the medical fraternity of Chicago appoint a committee, whose testimony would be universally accepted, to hold a "seance" with Mr. Brown, and report the facts."

Jewish Sects and Theories.

Primarily the Jews were one people, and one in faith. But after being dispersed and gathered again, their opinions were so diversified that in process of time three sects arose. Says Josephus: "The Jews for a great while had three sects of philosophy peculiar to themselves—the sect of the Essenes and the sect of the Sadducees, and the third sort of opinions was that of those called Pharisees." Josephus gives us the views of these different sects on the soul of man; but the origin of their views is so manifest that they afford no help to modern theologians.

1. The views of the Essenes are thus stated: "For their doctrine is this ....that the souls are immortal and continue forever, and that they come out of the most subtle air, and are united to their bodies as to prisons, into which they are drawn by a certain natural enticement; but that when they are set free from the bonds of the flesh they then, as released from a long bondage, rejoice and mount upward. And this is like the opinion of the Greeks, that good souls have their habitation beyond the ocean, in a region that is neither oppressed with storms of rain or snow, or with intense heat, but that this place is such as is refreshed by the gentle breathing of a west wind, that is perpetually blowing from the ocean; while they allot to bad souls a dark and tempestuous den, full of never-ceasing punishments. And, indeed, the Greeks seem to me to have followed the same notion when they allotted the islands of the blessed to their brave men, whom they call heroes and demi-gods; and to the souls of the wicked, the region of the ungodly, in Hades, where their fables relate that certain persons, such as Siszphus, and Tantalus, and Ixion, and Titzus are punished; which is built on this first supposition, that souls are immortal." (Wars, B. 2, C. 8, S. 11.)

2. The views of the Pharisees are thus presented: "They also believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that, under the earth, there will be rewards or punishments, accordingly as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life." (Antiquities, B. 18, C. 1, S. 3.)

3. The Sadducees are thus spoken of: "But the doctrine of the Sadducees is this, that the souls die with the bodies." (Ant. B. 18, C. 1, S. 4.) And it is added in Acts 23:8, "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection."

Thus it is seen that the Essenes patterned after the Greeks, in part, in arranging their theory of the soul, claiming that it mounted up at the dying hour and flew away—not to heaven, but over on to the eastern shore of a distant ocean, to be fanned by a west wind, while the Greeks selected the islands. But the Pharisees patterned after another heathen view, which locates disembodies men down in an under-ground home. The Sadducees, in their opposition, went to the opposite extreme, and insisted that death not only wholly killed men, but that it eternally killed them—never to live again.

Jesus repudiated all these systems by proclaiming himself the life giver, and by promising reward to "every man" at his future return from heaven; thus virtually discarding all theories of a future endless life, except through himself at the resurrection, and thus cutting off all reward till he should come again to wake up the slumbering dead, and to receive the saints unto himself, when he will send his angels to gather his elect from every realm.

Transmigration.

We are sometimes met with the following argument: As the Pharisees held the doctrine of the soul's immortality in the time of the Savior, why did he not refute it, if it was not correct? We ask with equal propriety, As the Pharisees also held the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, why did not Christ refute that? And if we can make Christ endorse the one view because he did not directly combat it, we make him endorse both views on the same principle. But right here we are sometimes met with the denial that the Pharisees advocated the transmigration of souls, the claim being made that the reputed discourse of Josephus on hades is not genuine, and that these words, "He will make a resurrection of all men from the dead not procuring transmigration of souls from one body to another," are falsely attributed to Josephus. Let this be as it may, Josephus remarks elsewhere concerning the Pharisees: "They say, that all souls are incorruptible, but that the souls of good men only are removed into other bodies." (Wars, B. 2, C. 8, S. 14.) Thus the Pharisees did hold the theory of soul-transmigration, as well as the theory of soul-immortality; and they received the one from the same source they did the other; and Jesus invalidated both theories by proclaiming himself the life-giver: "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." Thus, as the life-giver, he said: "I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly." Again: "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." Again: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." (John 6:53, 54.) Here Christ positively restricts immortality or eternal life to believers, thus repudiating all theories of natural immortality, and thus cutting off all speculations concerning a disembodied state. This kills both soul-emigration and soul-transmigration.

Sheol.

BR. SHELDON:—What are we to understand by the word Sheol? Does it, in any instance, in the Scripture refer to the state or condition of the dead? and, if so, please give chapter and verse. In conversation with a clergyman, a short time since, he told me that in no instance was the term Sheol used in the Scriptures, except with special reference to the soul as a distinct, conscious element, separate from the body; and that, although the body might die and be laid in the grave, the soul would go to Sheol, or the under ground world, as he calls it. Will you give us an explanation of this term through the columns of THE TIMES, And oblige

L. W. WOOD.

West Salem, Wisconsin.

There is not an instance in the Bible where the term Sheol signifies the realm of disembodied souls—that is purely a theological speculation, but it is often used to indicate the state of the dead, as in the following text: "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in Sheol." (Eccl. 9:10.) Here the term Sheol cannot signify a realm of spirits, unless they are there void of "knowledge" and "wisdom;" and, if so, they might as well be dead with the body.

While our version of the Old Testament Scriptures sometimes render Sheol "hell," and sometimes "grave," the Douay version uniformly translates it hell, as in these instances, in which neither a hell of punishment, nor a spirit-world can be meant. "Let not his hoary head go down to hell in peace." (1 Kings 2:6) "And thou shalt bring down his gray hairs with blood to hell." (1 Kings 2:9.) "They are laid in hell like sheep." (Ps. 49:15.) "I will go down to my son into hell mourning." (Gen. 37:35.) "If any mischief befall him in the land to which you go, you will bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to hell." (Gen. 42:38.) This hell certainly can only mean the state of the dead, and this is always the meaning of Sheol, whether rendered hell or grave.

Do we Believe it?

We profess to believe that the day of judgment is almost due, when the doom of the race will be irrevocably fixed; yet in many respects we do not act as though we more than half believe it. Actions will correspond with belief. A sickly, faint belief, that rises but a little higher than an assent to a truth, will only give rise to faint activity. A strong, healthy faith will produce vigorous action. As the pulse tells the condition of the physical system, so outward activity indicates the strength of inward faith. When brought to realize that the day of judgment is an impending event, apathy will disappear, and activity will take its place. Who can remain inactive while feeling that the race are speedily to be ushered into the judgment of the great day? And yet,

"Signs there's no mistaking, Proclaim Messiah near."

Do we believe what we profess to concerning the fulfillment of prophecy, which points with infallible precision to our present chronological stand-point as one very near the judgment? Then let us rise in the strength of God, and give the gospel trumpet a significant sound, and rouse the people from their slumbers. We cannot awake others successfully till we are fully awake ourselves. Watchman, cry aloud, "The morning cometh, and also the night."

Breath of Lives.

In our version of the record of man's creation, it is said that God breathed "the breath of life" into man. (Gen. 2:7.) But finding that beasts also are said to possess the "breath of life," and that if this means a deathless soul in one case, it must mean the same in the other, a new dodge is resorted to.

Not unfrequently are we met with the claim that the original warrants this rendering, "Breathed into his nostrils the breath of lives," instead of life; and then the claim is set up that man possesses two lives—one mortal life and one immortal life.

1. If this were true, and, if the immortal life were a personality, the mortal life must also be a personality, thus making two invisible personalities in each human body.

2. But to the astonishment of the advocates of the two lives for each man, they will find that the original just as positively attributes the "breath of lives" to the animal creation, as to man. (Gen. 6: 17.) Have the animals two lives apiece, one being an invisible animal, living on after the stroke of death? Let those who circulate this kind of theological currency accept their own coin, or acknowledge that it is counterfeit, and cease circulating it for time to come.

3. The simple truth is, God gave man and beast a succession of lives in the sense of power to transmit life to their offspring, instead of working a new miracle every time a child is born, to infuse life into it. It is an inherent element in both man and beast, being transmitted; but is not a personality in either case.

Chicago Gathering.

CHICAGO, August 13, 1873.

Several brethren met at No. 25 West Lake street. D. Mathewson called to the chair, O. S. Knapp, Secretary.

A. W. Tucker explained the object of the meeting, followed by general talk, and adjourned to 9 o'clock A. M. Thursday.

THURSDAY, Aug. 14.

Met according to adjournment.

After general discussion the following preamble and resolution, offered by L. P. Fox, was adopted by the meeting, and voted to be printed in THE TIMES:

WHEREAS, The A. C. P. Society are now in debt to the amount of $4,000; and,

WHEREAS, An appeal has been made by our Editor and Business Agent, for the brethren to help us out of this debt; and,

WHEREAS, That appeal has not been responded to by our brethren; and,

WHEREAS, The said debts must and shall be paid; therefore,

Resolved, That if there can be ten of our influential brethren found, that will come forward and take all of the assets of said Society, and pay all of its liabilities, and continue to publish the ADVENT CHRISTIAN TIMES as an Advent paper, according to the conditions of a certain Lease of ninety-nine (99) years, that has been received by the New Board of said A. C. P. Society, that we are in favor of leasing to the said ten brethren for the said purpose; and, also

Resolved, That if there cannot be found ten of said brethren to take the same, then we are in favor of leasing the same to five brethren; and if there cannot be five brethren found then we are in favor of leasing to any one brother, for the said purpose, in whom we have confidence.

O. S. KNAPP, Secretary.

Taking the Lead.

The flock, to some extent, will follow the leading shepherds; hence, it is important that they lead in the right direction. They are commanded to "feed the flock of God, taking the oversight thereof," and yet how many to whom this trust is committed, lead the flock into pastures of desolation and carnality, because more congenial to their own relish. To be plain, as a general rule, our ministers need more experimental religion.

If we would become pre eminently a consecrated people, we must have a consecrated ministry—a sanctified, devoted ministry. A minister with a head full of good theology, and but little grace in his heart, is only half prepared to preach. Not that he has too much theology, for that is impossible, provided he has the right kind; but that he has too little grace. As "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," if the heart is fully consecrated, it will pour forth a sanctified stream through the mouth, and thus the spirit and the word will go together, augmenting spirituality in the church, as well as enlightening the intellect. But graceless theologians are apt to succeed best in winning graceless converts, and thus the church is replenished only with unconsecrated members. A consecrated ministry is the safeguard of the church. Let us grow in grace.

Preaching.

How sadly at fault is the most of the preaching of the day. How little like losing sight of self, and holding up Christ, instead of magnifying self and exhibiting talent, to secure the applause of men. How much more attention is paid to making a fine speech, than to bringing men to admire Christ. Do ministers forget that they are Christ's, and that they are delivering a message for him, and ought to do it in the humble spirit of their Divine Master? Preaching should never be for the purpose of exhibiting self, but to hold up Christ and his message. Let the object be to induce men to admire Christ, and not self. Give more thought to the matter than to the manner of preaching.

Board Meeting.

The members of the Board of the W. A. C. Publishing Society are hereby notified that a meeting of the Board will be held on the 16th day of Sept., 1873, at the office, No. 25 West Lake street, Chicago. The object of said meeting is to either cancel its debts in full, or to lease the property to a party or parties (if they can be found in whom the Board has confidence), who will publish the A. C. TIMES in harmony with the requirements of the lease, and assume the debts.

D. MATHEWSON, President.

"Who are Christians?"

AMOS SANFORD.

The question which heads this article was the subject (?) of a leading editorial in the Restitution of July 31, in which I do not find any Bible answer, but I do find another creed laid down for the government of the church of God.

The question may be easily answered in a general sense, to be the true followers of Christ, or as Webster defines a Christian, "a real disciple of Christ." "And the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch." (Acts 11: 26, Bible Union.) Those Christians belonged to "the sect of the Nazarenes," (Acts 24:5,) the true "church of God," and it was not so difficult then as now to answer the question.

That there are real disciples now as then, I believe; but if I were called upon to point them out and designate who are and who are not Christians, I would have to acknowledge my incompetency to judge, or proceed to guess at it, as do many of our judges of the present day. True disciples of Christ, in this mortal state, will rather say with their Master while in the flesh, "I judge no man," (John 8: 15,) and leave the question to be definitely settled by "the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing." (2 Tim. 4: 1.) It seems to me, that it would be much better for all who profess to be Christians, if they would heed the admonition of the apostle James when he says, (5: 9,) "Murmur not one against another, brethren, that ye be not judged. Behold, the Judge stands at the door." (Bible Union.)

In the editorial referred to, the writer, assuming to speak for that organization of Christians which he denominates "the church of God," puts up the "bars" so closely that I fear I shall never be able to become a member of the so called church of God, for if there is any one thing that is clearly settled more than another in my mind, it is that Christians should have no creed except the pure word of God. He lays down a creed (by what authority I know not) as clear and as distinct as that of any orthodox church, to which I cannot assent, and the readers of the Restitution will not subscribe, without disregarding all their former professions of love for the Bible as their only rule of faith and practice. He only writes four "articles of faith," leaving "a score of other items" resting in parol, which he says he "might go on and enumerate."

Upon this point I remark that a verbal creed is just as unscriptural as a written one. Indeed I prefer the latter and if my salvation depended on my being a member of an organization having "articles of faith" I would feel like returning to the Free Will Baptist church, from whence I came, because its creed is more in harmony with the Word of God than any I have ever read, and I am inclined to believe that there is as great a proportion of the real disciples of Christ in that organization as any other having a written creed.

The creed of the Restitution is negatively stated and excludes from fellowship with "the church of God" (so-called) (1) those who having once been baptized do not believe it necessary to be again plunged into the water after hearing the Bible doctrine of the age-to come, (2) those who "call themselves Christians" and "are regarded as good men on account of their honesty and liberality" but "who are utterly ignorant of even the first principles of the gospel" as proclaimed by "the church of God," (and these must not be called "brethren"); (3) those who heartily believe the teachings of the gospel as taught in the Restitution and yet refuse to be re-baptized, and (4) those who believe in open communion, or that the Lord's supper is free to all the real disciples of Christ.

Tht position taken is, that none are Christians except such as have heard the gospel or good news of "the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus," (Acts 8:12,) and have been baptized since they learned as much about the kingdom as the editor of the Restitution. If this be true, then men and women ought not to be immersed until they learn all that is to be known about the kingdom, and Peter (2 Pet. 1: 5) was wrong when he said to baptized believers, "add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge," etc.

When men have heard the gospel as Peter preached it, are "pricked in their hearts" and cry out "men and brethren what shall we do?" (Acts 2:37,) it seems to me that the answer ought to be, "repent and be baptized, every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins," and there is no time to stop and ask each one how much he knows about the kingdom, or whether he has read the "articles of faith" of "our church," else three thousand could not be baptized in one day.

I thank God that the truth has made me free, and I am no longer bound by human creeds. I recognize the fact and rejoice in knowing that there is a true "church of God," on earth which will gain the victory over death and the grave when Jesus comes, and rise in blessed immortality, to reign with him. I hope to be among the number of the "chosen," and join in the triumphant shout, although not now known as a member of either of the two organizations assuming the name of "the church of God." I write not for the purpose of controversy, for I love our age-to-come brethren as I do other Christians and have heretofore advocated a union between them and the Adventists of Kansas. I write against human creeds and for true Bible Christianity. I write in love of all who love our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. I write to exhort the brethren and sisters to stick close to their Bibles in these "perilous times." I write that the Advent Christians of Kansas may take fresh courage and "go forward" in the strength of Israel's God, proclaiming "the glad tidings of the kingdom of God," (Luke 8:1,) obeying the command "that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another," (1 Jno. 3: 23,) for "everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ has been begotten of God," (1 Jno. 5 :1,) and "all that is begotten of God overcomes the world." (v. 4.)

I write because the time is short and we have no time to stop now and settle articles of faith for the sake of union. I am in favor of Christian union, where all are bound together by the strong cords of Christian love, upon the common platform of the sacred writings alone, but "can two walk together except they be agreed?" (Amos 3: 3.) Brethren and sisters, let us welcome all true Christians into our ranks, who will leave their creeds on the outside.

JOHN BRADFORD said, "Covet not the things that are in this world, but long for the coming of the Lord Jesus.

Miscellaneous.

Postal-Cards.

Persons should not mail two postal cards joined together, one containing an inquiry and the other a blank, upon which to make a reply. Both will be cancelled at the office of mailing, and the blank one rendered useless. The following ruling of the Postoffice Department has just been made respecting postal cards. These cards are not to be advertised, are not to be returned to the writers, nor sent to the dead-letter office. If undelivered sixty days after their receipt they should be burned. No postal card which contains a scurrilous or obscene communication, or which is folded and the edges fastened together, or to which a slip of paper is attached to conceal the communication, or to which any printed matter, photograph, or picture is affixed, will be allowed transmission through the mails, nor can two cards be pasted together and transmitted without prepayment of postage (in addition to the stamps imprinted thereon) at full letter rates. All such cards will be destroyed at the mailing office.

—A gravel train running through a swamp between Orellia and Otherly, ran over two cows. The van, containing laborers, was badly broken up, and two, named Stevens and Powell, were instantly killed and six others fatally wounded.

—All newspapers, with one exception, in Western Kentucky, oppose the project of forming a new state out of portions of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi. The project in that section of Kentucky is esteemed as visionary.

—A band of from fifty to sixty Indians were roaming about the country south of Fort McKavett, and, in the absence of cavalry at Fort Conners, scouts had been sent in all directions to warn the settlers. Much alarm existed, and citizens were arming to defend themselves.

—There was a fire at Wapello, Iowa, Aug. 14 which burned about one-third of the business portion of that place. The fire originated in a hardware store in the business part of the town. Nine stores in all, we understand, were destroyed, with some other business places and dwellings.

—A sad accident occurred last evening at the road crossing on the St Louis & Jacksonville Railroad, about seven miles from Alton Ill., and near Piasa Creek. Mrs Schneider who lives near Brighton, and her son, who is here on a visit from Indiana, were returning home in a wagon and when on the crossing were run over by the evening down passenger train, and both instantly killed, their bodies being terribly mangled.

—The Rev. Norman Badger, army chaplain at Fort Concha, Western Texas, arrived at St. Louis Aug. 4 en route for Washington. A scouting party returned to Concha last Saturday week, after ten days' absence, bringing in a number of stolen ponies captured from the Indians off their reservations; also the fresh scalp of a white girl thirteen years old, who with a woman, was killed and scalped on Staked Plain, about two weeks before.

Mr. Badger says it is now known that Gen. Mackenzie during his great expedition against the Comanches, last fall, killed upwards of a hundred of them. It was reported at the time that he had killed but twenty three.

—Several weeks ago a band of Indians appeared near old Camp Colorado and shot and stabbed a Mrs. Williams, and also shot a little girl of Mrs. Williams' and mashed her head against a door post and threw her body into the fire. They then entered the house and shot a girl eight years old, and carried her away with them. Mrs. Williams notwithstanding her two wounds, crawled into the house, pulled her little child out of the fire rolled her in a wet blanket and laid her on a bed. Mrs. Williams' husband soon after returned, to whom she related the circumstances, and then died, but the infant, whose head was mashed almost to a jelly, was still alive when last heard from, and would probably recover.

—Dispatches from the East report a storm prevailing in that section. In New York city the poor had to battle with rats driven from the sewers by the rising flood, and their wretched beds were surrounded by water. There has not been any serious damagement of the mails. From Baltimore it is reported that the streets in various parts of the city are submerged and cellars flooded. Jones Falls has overflowed, and a portion of the old flooded district was again inundated, in some places to the depth of four or five feet. All the railroads running to Baltimore have been more or less damaged, and the detention of mails is more general than in some years. On the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad land slides occurred at Red Cut and Vinegar Hill and other places, and a wash at Elkridge landing threw the Cincinnatti express, bound west, off the track. The train, however was not damaged. The St. Louis express, due last evening, was delayed at some point. The damage will not be heavy, and the main line will be in running order by 5 o'clock this afternoon. The track at Seven station, on the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, is submerged delaying all the trains. The storm broke so unexpectedly on New York that ship masters and freighters had a busy time for making secure their vessels and goods exposed on the docks. About midnight several canal boats broke loose and drifted helplessly about, but none, so far reported, have been lost. At Jersey City a ferry-boat was sunk, and it is thought that some of the crew were drowned.

Correspondence.

"He that Hath a Dream, let Him Tell It."

In THE TIMES of July 29, 1873, I found in "Queries," information wanted on Matt. 16, v. 27.

In regard to this, I wish to relate a dream which I had about six years ago. At that time the text in Rev. 7:9 laid heavy on my mind: "After these things, I saw and behold a great multitude, which no one could number, out of every nation and all tribes, and peoples, and tongues, standing before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed in white robes, and palms in their hands."

And as I read about a great multitude which no one could number, I thought when Christ should stand on earth that it should be nearly impossible for all to behold, or to see him, and be with him forever; in consequence of this I had the following dream

I dreamed that I was on a journey, and while traveling I came across a great field full of thorns, and my way was cut off. I looked around for another road, but in vain So I thought I would have to go this way. I took fresh courage and tried to pursue my way, and to go further, but the more I traveled the more I begun to fall back, so that at last my clothing was all torn, and the blood ran in great quantities from my body, so that I felt insensible, and it came to my mind to return. Wherever my eyes turned I could see nothing but thorns; but then, I thought again, should you return now after having traveled thus far? So I said to myself, no; I will pursue my course. So I continued my way until I had gone a short distance, and, behold, the road was clear for me and the thorns were gone. I saw before me a great open place, which had on both sides trees; and behind those trees there was a kind of green pasture, on which there was placed a great number of tables, and with them a great multitude of people who were eating. The place was laid in with gold, and so were the tables, chairs, plates, and spoons; the air was pure, pleasant and refreshing, so that it took but a very short time after my journey to feel quite strong again. I felt so happy that I began to shout for joy. I was so astonished at all that I saw, that I could not make out where I was.

After a little while there came a young man, who asked me if I knew where I was? I said no.

"Well," said he, "you are now in the New Kingdom, the kingdom of God; and I am sent to you to explain all those things which you see here."

After this I inquired of him, "What is the cause of all this light here, which is so pure and clear, as I see neither sun, moon, nor stars."

He pointed me to a great light in the distance, which he said was our Lord Jesus Christ in his glory. (Rev. 21:23.) I told the young man that I wished to be nearer our Lord Jesus Christ; but he told me that such could not for the present, as I had first to pass through much trouble, sorrow and affliction, of which the thorns were an emblem He told me to look around me very carefully, and if there was anything which I could not understand I should tell him and he would explain it to me.

I then inquired of him: "What is the meaning of all those tables, and the people around them?"

"These," he said, "are the churches, which are healed from the time of Adam until Christ's second coming."

I then observed an empty table at the north side of the place, which, he told me, was for a church, which had to be organized yet; and as soon as that takes place, he said, then will the Lord return to take his kingdom.

After this I looked at the people seated round the table, and I saw how happy and contented they were, notwithstanding they did not all have the same mark; their dresses were all of pure white, and they all had crowns on their heads, but some had the finest kind of pearls interwoven in their crowns, while others wore crowns of less value. So I asked: "Why do not all this people have the same kind of crowns?"

He told me that those with the brightest crowns were the teachers. I then observed that there were many churches who had no teachers at all. So he told me those were not willing to be despised for Christ's sake; they were for that reason not allowed to be clothed in white, and had to remain outside.

I then looked for the church to which I belonged at that time, and when I found it I saw many persons which I knew, and many which were unknown to me; upon which, I said that there were a good many there whom I did not know, and the answer was:

"Those are at the present time yet unconverted, but they will be converted before the end."

Still, I missed a great number which belonged to the same church; and, when I inquired about them, the young man said that they had been found unworthy by our Lord. And while I looked around I found happiness, glory and pleasure to the uppermost.

At the time I awoke, I was sorry that it did not last longer, while I love to dwell on the blessings the Lord has prepared for those who love him and his appearing; to enjoy those pleasures which eyes have not seen, nor ears have heard.

May the Lord help us while we journey on our way to the kingdom, until Jesus comes the second time, without sin, unto salvation, and lead us up to the Golden City, to enjoy his presence forever and ever more, is my prayer. CHAS. KOIER.

I am now loocated in Ashland, Newaygo county, Mich., and I preach to the church here half of the time. Two weeks ago, I visited the church in Wexford county, about one hundred miles north. Preached to them twice, and baptized five; praise God. I found live, good brethren and sisters in Wexford, that are waiting for his Son from heaven, and are letting their light shine. May the Lord bless them; they did not send me empty away. There is a large field for labor in Northern Michigan, which ought to be attended to. It is a missionary field and with sufficient means much good might be accomplished. The harvest is truly great, but the laborers are few.

From Mrs. F. E Cook, Brownsville, Saline County, Mo.

Your paper is all the preaching we have here, and I am making it do all the good I can. The truth is more powerful than even the destructive tornado, for it is sharper than a two edged sword, and will fight its way through all opposition.

My Christian friends, let us dig deep and build on the sure foundation, Jesus Christ being the great corner stone. As the frail works of mortal men fall before the face of the tornado, so shall the wicked be when Christ comes. Then let us lay up our treasures in heaven, for the Saviour will come upon the world as a thief. I heard a Methodist minister say in a sermon recently that man's learning and knowledge teaches us that we are immortal. Now the Word of God teaches us to seek for immortality. How can we seek for what we now have? Let us press on, for Jesus is our friend, and if we lack wisdom he will not refuse to give it.

"At the Time of the End shall be the Vision."

P. ALLING.

As this text locates the time of the fulfillment of the vision, and as much has recently been written upon it; making the periods of Daniel and Revelation literal days and yet future, and applied to a literal antichrist, the antitype of the beasts of Rev. 13 and 17, I have been stirred up to a re-examination of the whole subject, with the following result which is commended to the prayerful consideration of all lovers of truth.

In the 2d ch. of Daniel we have it clearly declared that the powers symbolized by "the iron and the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold" will all be in existence in some form and destroyed by the kingdom of God after the second advent of Christ. As the powers represented by the four beasts of chapter 7 are the same as that of the four parts of the metalic image, it follows that those four beasts will also have an existence in some way in that form of earth's government when thus broken and destroyed. We will now look into the book of Revelations and see what is there revealed upon the subject.

In ch. 13:2 we find this testimony, "And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion, and the dragon gave him his power and seat and great authority." This beast unquestionably represents papal Rome for a period of 1260 literal years, and was during that time a likeness of those ravenous beasts, and was made so by the dragon or imperial Rome. Hence those three beasts were preserved in that likeness, to the close of the last century, when that period ended in the wars of Napoleon I. on the papal beast, which was "wounded by a sword and carried into captivity." By reference to verses 11-14 of this chapter, it will be seen that this same ten horned beast, thus wounded or killed by a sword and carried into captivity, is to live again under or during the existence of the two horned beast. These facts demonstrate this, that the rise of the two horned beast is this side ending of the 1260 period, and hence the likeness of the leopard, the bear, and the lion, are all carried forward, and are parts of this two horned beast. Again, by reference to chapter 17, we have these further additions, viz: That the ten horns or kingdoms referred to by Daniel have an existence under the eighth and last form of the Roman government, and belongs to the scarlet beast, and are to stand up against Christ in the battle of the great day! Of the heads of this beast we have in verses 9 and 11, this language: "The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth." "And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth and is of the seven [not the seventh as is after quoted] and goeth into perdition." The language of verse 9 is definite and expressly teaches that "the woman sitteth upon all these seven heads." As those heads represent the seven consecutive forms of Roman government in the past commencing with the Regal, in the days of Romulous, and as five were in the past when the revelation was given, and the one that "then was," being imperial, and constituted the sixth, the papacy was then in the future and when it did come up inspiration calls it the beast (masculin) for 1260 years; hence it follows to a certainty, that the papal harlot never sat upon one of those heads, except it be this side of the close of the last century.

Again, the peculiar phraseology of verse 11, "is of the seven," conveys these thoughts, that this eighth form, is made of, or includes within it, all of the preceding seven; and that this head will control the entire body of the scarlet beast, which body is to be made up of and include the "many waters," or "multitudes and peoples and tongues and nations of earth," over which the papal harlot has a kingdom above or superior to them all. I see not how these and kindred prophecies can be fulfilled without this application.

We will now examine and see if there is in existence a form of government in the earth that bears rule over the prophetic world answering to the foregoing conclusions. If there is where is it to be found, and where did it arise? If these questions can be answered affirmatively, I see not why we may not claim to have found a solution of these mysterious symbols. As a people we claim ch. 10 v. 13 was fulfilled (as noted above), in the wars of Napoleon, at the close of the last century, where the forty-two prophetic months ended, upon papal Rome, as attested by the history of the times. The historians that recorded those events recorded also the following facts, viz;

1. The downfall of Napoleon I.; the nations of Europe assembled, representatively, in what is called the Vienna congress, and readjusted "the Chaotic state of Europe," into which it had been thrown by the French revolution and followed by the wars of Napoleon on the surrounding nations. (This assembly was in 1814-15.) The work accomplished by that congress in part was these:

First; This papacy was restored to the position she occupied, ecclesiastically and politically, from that day till her downfall in 1870.

Second; Order was restored to Europe.

Third; International laws were adopted, politically and commercial, preserving to each nation their own internal laws, and religious institutions.

Fourth; These laws have been continued and adopted, with various modification, by the other nations of earth, as the law of nations. Those that were refractory have been coerced into subjection by those allies.

Fifth; Those laws and regulations still continue in a weakened or demoralized state.

Sixth; A new era then dawned upon Europe and the holy see.

Seventh; All the various forms of European government were there represented.

Eighth; In those forms there was the full significant Bible number of seven all of which aided in or consented to the restoration of the papacy. It was however, the imperial and regal forms that took the lead in that work.

God Cares For His Own.

A judge said tauntingly to a woman, condemned for her religion, and who had great faith in Providence, "I shall send you to prison, and then how will you be fed?" Her reply was, "If it be my Heavenly Father's will I shall be fed from your table." And so it was. The wife of the judge, hearing of this, was so struck with the woman's steadfastness and faith in God, that she supplied her with all she needed during her imprisonment, and she herself was brought to the Saviour. A Slumbering Church.

REV. THEODORE IRVING, LL. D.

This may be considered by some a strange definition of the church in these days. There is so much agitation, so much stir, so much contending with the faith, that it would seem as if the church was wide-awake. But is this really so? The waters of a superficial Christianity may indeed be far wider than they were, but are they not at the time far more shallow and run with less force?

What is the life of God's people in this world, what is their waiting for the coming of their Lord but a slumbering and a sleeping? What are the things which are real to them, about which are their daily interests and fears and hopes, but the dreams of this state of time? Where are the realities of eternity? Where, but heard fitfully, as the sleeper hears the clock tolling the night hour, and turns him to slumber again? What is the most zealous, the most energetic of God's people but a slumberer and a sleeper, compared with that character of entire devotion to things unseen which should be his? How very far is the holiest saint who has ever adorned the Church below, from the loliest of the angels of God, who are proposed to us as our pattern in doing his will! As an earnest writer truly remarks, "when we speak of the history of the Church of Christ, of her obedience to his dying commands, of her missionary exertions, of her letting her own light shine before men, we may well substitute for the term the slumber of the Church; for we have indeed through all these long ages, during which the bridegroom has tarried, been slumbering and sleeping; weak in faith, wavering in hope, cold in love; timid and slothful for Christ, and earnest only for self and the world."

What minister of the gospel does not lose heart as he looks through his congregation seeking for helpers. He wants workers for the Sunday-school, workers for the mission field in his parish, workers among the poor and needy. Many, through the blessing of the Lord upon his ministry, have been brought into the fold: but where are they? What are they doing for Christ? Since the hour of their consecration they have not done the first thing They are of no manner of use to the Master. They are a positive hindrance They are sleeping on their watch. Admirable plans are formed for a grand onslaught upon the enemy, but when and where they are most needed they are not to be found.

In conversing this summer with one of our most distinguished generals on our late war, he stated that one of the great difficulties they had to contend with was that they were obliged to give important positions to untried men; and in the conflict they did not know where they would find them.

In one of the most critical battles of that year, he said, in which the men fought bravely and carried everything before them, and victory seemed certain, and the division of the army where he commanded was successful at every point, as evening came and stopped the carnage, the battle was not won, the right wing had disappeared Spurring his horse in that direction he discovered the whole division hid in one of those vast ravines which run through Virginia. He demanded of the officer where they had been during the battle and why they ran away. "Why," said he with great surprise, "we did not run away; we have been here all the time."

So it is with many a division of Christ's army; they do not run away from the foe, but while the battle is the fiercest they are found slumbering.

No such laggards will do for a day like this. We want young men and women on fire with a holy zeal, to whom the service of Christ is a real service: the glory of God a real thing.

What is the position of a Christian in the world? Adopted into God's family, members by profession of his Son, he has set us each our work to do and placed his grace within our reach, whereby it may be faithfully and effectually done. We were sent here to glorify God; not to escape his wrath; not just to manage to be saved on the day of his coming; not to think only of our own souls, or to live a strict and selfish religious life for our own sake; no, the Father never loved us; the Son never died for us; the Spirit never pleaded with us for any such unworthy purpose.

We were sent and placed here that from our life, our thoughts, our words, our deeds, there might be positive fruit, real, tangible results, brought forth on God's side for his work of love for his name to be known, his purposes carried onward in this world of men. To this end are all the dealings of Providence with us; to this end all the supplies of grace are put within our reach. To this end, likewise, are all our trials, all our burdens, all our trials in the flesh and in the spirit. It is the Lord's purpose with all his people that they should work for him in life and life's duties; not in their own strength' but in his. That they should toil up through darkness and disappointment to the sunshine of the everlasting hills, where the Sun of righteousness may light them in the work of life. Oh! that every Christian could more thoroughly apprehend this the truth of our lives; that we are set here to glorify God; that just and simply in this does our whole value, our whole glory, our whole happiness consist: and that this is to be accomplished in and not out not out of the commonplace every-day path in which he has marked out our course, by doing good how we can and and when we can.—The Christian at Work.

Solomon's Temple Compared with Other Ancient Works.

The skill, the art, the mighty toil that have been devoted to the adornment, and to the decoration of this most ancient place of worship, have been of extraordinary magnitude. The grandest legacy of Egyptian antiquity, the great pyramid, demanded, indeed, a greater amount of naked human labor; but in Moriah there is a compulsion of the features of nature herself to the service of the builder. In actual bulk the great pyramid is to the Temple rock as five to nine, if we descend but as far as the sils of the five double gates of the mountains of the house. If we carry the comparison down to a level at which the lowest foundation of the walls is inlaid in the rock at the angles of the inclosure, the bulk is three times that of the great pyramid. The cubic contents of the mason's work may not amount to a tenth part of that piled up by Souphis. But the hill has been honey-combed with chambers and galleries; and the declining part to the south covered with vaults and arches, to which Gheezeh can show no parallel. No merely artificial structure could have so successfully resisted the resolute efforts of the two greatest military nations of the ancient world to destroy its existence and obliterate its memory. No other monument, long surviving the era of Asiatic and Italian power, can ever, like the noble sanctuary, mark by its very ruins the successive periods of its glory and fall.

If we regard not so much the evidence of the labor devoted to the work of the Temple as the effect produced on the mind by its apparent magnitude, we may suggest the following comparisons: The length of the eastern wall of the sanctuary is rather more than double that of one side of the pyramid. Its heigth, from the foundation rock at the south, and near the northern angles, was nearly one third of that of the Egyptian structure. If to this great height of 152 feet of solid wall be added the descent of 144 feet to the bed of the Kedron, and the further elevation of 160 feet attained by the pinnacle of the Temple porch, we have a total height of 426 feet, which is only 59 feet less than that of the great pyramid. The area of the face of the eastern wall is more than double that of one side of the pyramid. Thus the magnitude of the noble sanctuary of Jerusalem far exceeded that of any other temple in the world. Two ampitheaters of the size of the coliseum would have stood within its colossal girdle, and left room to spare. The coliseum is said to have seated 87,000 spectators, and accommodated 23,000 more in its arena and passages. For such a number to have been crammed within its circle, the space for each person must have been limited to seventeen by twenty inches. Allowing two cubits each way, or four square cubits for each worshiper in the Temple, the sanctuary would have contained 30,000; the chel, including the priest's court, 20,000 more, and there would have been room in the great court and cloisters to make the total reach more than 210,000.—Edinburg Review.

Religion and Philosophy.

A young man from the provinces, who was sent to Paris to finish his education, had the misfortune to get into bad company. He went so far as to wish, and finally to say, "There is no God. God is only a word." After staying several years in the capital, the young man returned to his family. One day he was invited to a respectable house, where there was a numerous company. While all were entertaining themselves with news, pleasure, and business, two girls, aged respectively twelve and thirteen, were seated in a bay window, reading together. The young man approached them, and said, "What beautiful romance are you reading so attentively, young ladies?" "We are reading no romance, sir; we are reading the history of God's chosen people." "You believe, then, that there is a God?" Astonished at such a question, the girls looked at each other, the blood mantling to their cheeks. "And you, sir, do not believe it?" "Once I believed, but, after living in Paris, and studying philosophy, mathematics, and politics, I am convinced that God is an empty word." "I, sir, was never in Paris—I have never studied philosophy, nor mathematics, nor any of those beautiful things which you know; but since you are so learned, and say there is no God, you can easily tell me whence the egg comes?" "A funny question, truly; the egg comes from the hen." "Which of them existed first, the egg or the hen?" "I really do not know what you intend with this question and your hen; but that which existed first was the hen." "There is a hen, then, which did not come from the egg?" "Beg your pardon, miss, I did not take notice that the egg existed first." "There is then an egg which did not come from a hen." "Oh, if you—beg [illegible]—that is—you see——" "I see[illegible]r, that you do not know whethe[illegible] egg existed before the hen, or the [illegible] before the egg." "Well, then, I [illegible] hen." "Very well, there is then [illegible] which did not come from an egg. [illegible] me now who made this [illegible] from which all other hens a[illegible]ome." "With your hen [illegible]ggs, it seems to me you take [illegible] poultry dealer." "By no means, sir. I only asked you to tell me whence the mother of all hens and eggs came?" "But for what object?" "Well, since you do not know, you will permit me to tell you. He who created the first hen, or, at you would rather have it, the first egg, is the same who created the world, and this being we call God. You, who cannot explain the existence of a hen or an egg without God, still wish to maintain or to be able to explain the existence of this world without God." The young philosopher was silent; he quietly took his hat, and, full of shame, departed, if not convinced of his folly, at least confouded by the simple questioning of a child.—The Rock.

Interpreters.

H. V. R.

The Apostle says, "To one is given the interpretation of tongues." Generally speaking, we are not satisfied with this, but even go further and say, that to us is given the intrepretation of the Word or Gospel of Christ. The world is full of interpreters, men, who know just how to explain every thing in the Book; and they claim that in the fullest sense, is given to them to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. The Bible is without doubt a revelation of the will and purposes of God; but that we can grasp it all, in our short life time, or even take in the fulness of infinite wisdom, is highly questionable. By this remark we do not mean that any part is hidden, but that man in his weakness, and with false education and impressions, is not competent to unfold the whole plan, and stand between God and man as the perfect interpreter.

To give our view of a doctrine is one thing, and to give the Bible view quite another. Some go so far as to find meanings which are not plainly spoken upon the face of the texts, and under this hidden word, they find tests of salvation. Out of this violation of one of the plainest propositions of the book, has grown wild and extravagant views, about the Resurrection, and the judgment. Men of apparent sober sense, get addled with some crotchet, and it becomes the central truth of the whole plan of Redemption; but when looked for in the Word of Truth, it is not there; it is an interpretation! a new discovery! And the specialist, (shall we say egotist?) is so happy that he has made a discovery, that he becomes puffed up, and cries out, Great is my idea. Believe it or be damned!

The world moves on however about as usual. Men think for themselves, that is if they are men, and the man with an idea, drops out of mind, and and his idea never germinates into a plant, bearing fruit, which shall be gathered into the garner in the ripening of God's harvests.

It would be better to interpret the words of our absent Lord, by the outflowing of words and deeds which shall make us "living epistles, read and known of all men." Men may interpret and promulgate theories, and make creeds for others, but there is a more excellent way.

Come into closer union with the moral precepts; emulate the examples of the Master; enrich your lives with noble deeds: believe the word in simplicity of heart; hope for what God has promised, and the crown will be yours, when the Son of man shall interpret the whole by the blessed consummation.—Restitution.

Asking and Giving.

"Please, dear papa," cried out Harry,
  "Get a rocking horse for me!
One as large as 'Bonnie Bessie'
  That Kris Kringle gave to Lee!"
And the father, looking downward
  On the eager, upturned face,
Cheeks rose flushed, and black eyes beaming
  Thought the pleader full of grace.

Yet he gave no word in answer,
  Said him neither yea nor nay;
And the boy, with drooping figure,
  Disappointed, crept away.
Days elapsed, and Hal forgetting
  Grief in many a merry play,
Hears, one morning, papa calling:
  "Harry, boy! just step this way."

Harry comes with flying footsteps,
  Stops in wonder and surprise—
Seeing—not a horse on rockers,
  Things of wood with sightless eyes—
But a real, live Shetland pony,
  Bridle, whip, and saddle too!
Wonderingly, hears papa saying:
  "This, my darling, is for you."

Then a shout, both loud and gleeful,
  Bursts from Harry's rosy lips:
"O papa! How can I thank you?
  May I have his name 'Eclipse?'
Why! I thought you did not hear me
  When you did not say, 'I will,'
And you've given not what I asked for,
  But a thing that's better still."

Thus, I think, our Heavenly Father,
  Seeing, where are our faith is blind,
When some good our hearts are craving,
  Seeking long we cannot find,
But withholds the longed for blessing,
  Leaves our want unsatisfied,
That He may bestow upon us
  Better gifts than those denied.

Mary's Prayer.

Dear God, bless my two little eyes and make them twinkle happy. Bless my two ears, and help them hear my mother call me. Bless my two lips, and make them speak kind and true. Bless my two hands, and make them good and not touch what they musn't. Bless my two feet, and make them go where they ought to. Bless by heart, and make it love Jesus and my mother and father, and Georgie, and every body. Please let ugly sin never get hold of me—never, never. For Christ's sake. Amen."

A Lord in the Family.

A pompous, silly school-boy was one day boasting how many rich and noble relatives he had; with an important air, he asked one of his school-fellows:

"Are there any 'Lords' in your family?

"Yes," said the little fellow, "there is one at least, for I have often heard my mother say the Lord Jesus Christ is our elder brother.

The boy was right, and as he grew up it was his privilege to know more of the elder brother, and to tell the multitudes of tidings of his grace.

Blessed are they who have one Lord in the family, and who know him as their elder brother!

The Rescued Child.

One day the Count of Sternau was out hunting. While in the woods he heard a mournful cry from a high rock. He looked up and beheld an eagle's nest, with a little boy therein, which the bird of prey was on the point of throwing to her brood as food. The sight of the lovely child moved the heart of the count. He climbed up the clift and rescued the child from the beaks and talons of the birds of prey, took him with him, and supplied the place of a loving father.

The boy, whose name was Otto, the count caused to be instructed in all necessary and useful knowledge, and the boy in turn gave his foster-father very much joy. He grew up to be a hopeful youth.

After a few years the count went with Otto to his country-seat. One day there came to the palace a stranger. He had through a destructive fire lost his house, together with all his other goods, and was compelled to seek the aid of kind hearted people.

Otto who was just feeding the fish in the garden ponds, as soon as he saw the shabbily-dressed man waiting with unusual ardor for some one in the garden, walked up to him kindly, and asked him what he wanted, manifested towards him a sympathy in consequence of the misfortune which had befallen him, and conducted him to the count. The latter was very kind to the afflicted man, comforted him, promised to help him, and commanded him to wait until he should come out of his library. In the meantime the man looked around the beautifully-adorned room, and observed a picture which represented Otto's rescue out of the eagle's nest. The count had had this picture painted as a memento and hung in this room. For a time the poor man gazed at this picture. Tears shone in his eyes. "Ah gracious sir," said he greatly astonished when the count entered the room, "tell me what story is represented by this beautiful picture."

The count related how, while hunting, he had found his dear Otto, had taken him to himself, and had adopted him as his own child; and how he could get no information from the parents of the child, notwithstanding all his inquiries.

"I too," said the poor man, "twenty years ago lost a dear little child in a similar manner. When we were once mowing in a medow, and our little child was sleeping beside us, there came a large bird of prey and seized him, and flew away with him."

The count immediately thought his Otto might, perhaps be the lost child of this man. He said to him: "Do you not know any mark by which you could recognize your child if he were still living?

"Oh, yes," answered the man, "our little Martin had a mole on his right arm."

The count had indeed discovered on Otto's right arm such a mark. The clothing, moreover, which Otto wore when he was found, exactly corresponded to the description.

The count could no longer be in doubt. He pointed to Otto and said: "See good man! This youth, who led thee to me, is thy lost Martin."

The fortunate father could not for a long time speak for joy: then he began to cry, and call out, "Oh my son."

Otto exclaimed "Oh my father."

As they wept, they heartily embraced each other.

They could not praise the dear God enough, because he had prepared for them so great a joy.

The count wished now to make the the acquaintance of Otto's mother, as also of his brothers and sisters, and sent his carriage to bring them. After a few days, the good mother together with his brothers and sisters, did really arrive at the castle. The happiness which the parents and children experienced at again seeing their much-loved Martin was indescribable. The count made a proposal to Otto's father, whose name was James, and of whose integrity he had fully convinced himself, to stay at his house with his family: and he left him a beautiful estate for his possession.

James soon arose to considerably good circumstances; but Otto became a great and distinguished man. Him, highly esteemed and loved by all who knew him, the Emperor afterwards raised to be the nobility, and, on account of his great services which he had rendered his country, appointed him Baron of Adlersheim.—Western Recorder.

WHATEVER you promise, be it little or much, do not fail to fulfill it, if in your power. The law of truth requires this. Habitual carelessness is a sin to be repented of and forsaken by the Christian. He that is careless either in regard to what he promises, or as to how he fulfills his promise, cannot be in a sanctified state, and will find it exceedingly difficult to abide in a state of justification. Speak the truth always in the love of it.

THE BISHOP sent for John Berridge to reprove him for preaching at all hours and on all days. "My Lord," said he modestly, "I preach only at two times." "Which are they" Mr. Berridge?" "In season and out of season, my lord."

Obituary.

STEVENS.—Fell asleep in Jesus, at Fonthill, Ontario, Canada, Aug. 5, 1873, Hannah, wife of Br. Henry Stevens. Aged, 57 years.

Sr. S. was attacked on the evening of Aug. 4, while in apparently good health, with severe pains in the stomach, from the effects of which she died the next morning. She was universally respected and beloved by all her acquaintances. Her deep piety and devotion to the cause of Christ has made her life one of usefulness.

She, with her husband, embraced the Advent faith in '43. Br. S. bears his loss with true Christian fortitude, sustained by his hope of a glorious reunion soon to take place.

Words of comfort from John 11:25, by

R. H. BATEMAN.

McFARLAND.—Died, in Woodbridge, Mich., May 9, of spinal fever, Charles Irwin, youngest son of W. I. & Louisa McFarland. Aged, one year and seven months.

The parents mourn, but not as those without hope, for they expect to meet their loved one, believing that "of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Sermon by the writer from 2 Sam. 14:14.

WM. BRANCH.

ALLEN.—Died, in Winona, Minn., Aug. 7, 1873, John F. Allen, only child of Eld. Thomas K. & Lydia Allen.

Johnny was a great sufferer for many years, but has fallen on that sleep, from which no slumberer ever wakes to weep. T. K. ALLEN.

Book Notices, Etc.

HISTORY OF THE SECOND ADVENT MESSAGE.—The rise, progress and known results of the proclamation now called "Second Adventism," or, properly, the message of the near coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and the doctrines and messages associated with it, the unexpected zeal of some of its friends, errors in which [illegible] fought, the efforts, bad logic, and arguments of its opponents to overthrow it, the persecution, strategy, slander, and falsehoods of its opposers, and the wonderful success God has given it in [illegible] and re-establishing the old fundamentals of the Bible and primitive Christianity in the hearts of tens of thousands of Christians, skeptics, and [illegible], is worthy of being published in a condensed historical form, though time should continue but a few days.

Such a work is much needed. There are thousands now amongst us who know but little of our past views, experiences, trials and victories, but little of the main principles which have been our guide and defence against errors old and new. There are thousands of others who are convinced of the truths which we teach and who will be greatly benefitted by such a work, giving definite forms of doctrine, much valuable information, a large amount of Bible instruction on vital points, correcting many misconceptions, slanders, and false reports. Such a work will fall into the hands of many ministers, scholars, editors, and other religious readers, to benefit them, and glorify God by the spread of his truth, to awaken sinners to prepare for the judgment.

We propose to publish such a work by subscription, when one thousand subscribers are obtained.

We shall give the chief points of doctrines originally taught forty years ago and onward, by Advent proclaimers, in America, Europe, and Asia, with biographical sketches of the pioneers; also, historical sketches of authors and editors, books and papers, missions and doctrines now taught. We shall give, in their own language, the rich experiences and new views of many who have emerged from the darkness of error and false traditions concerning the millennium, the nature of man, his state in death, and future rewards, into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel hope. We shall give in plates and diagrams the symbols and periods of Daniel and John, with dates of times fixed upon which have passed, and those yet future; also tables of some of the best chronologies of the Bible, with criticisms on Egyptian, Chinese, and other heathen chronologies.

We shall call to our aid several able writers, who are qualified for such a work, shall give specimen Sermons, Essays, Lectures and condensed reports of debates which have been held by able men; reviews of some of our chief opponents' efforts, on life, death, immortality, future punishment, and rewards. The signs of our times, and the great awakening in all Christian lands, on the subject of our Lord's personal and speedy coming, will be clearly stated.

No money called for till the book is published. It will contain 600 octavo pages, on good paper, neatly bound in cloth. Price, $3 00. The first thousand subscribers shall have it delivered to them for $2 50 each. This we can better afford to do than to await sales at full price.

All ministers, and others who will secure subscribers, shall receive a suitable prize when the book is delivered. Address, I. C. WELLCOME,
Yarmouth, Maine.

Names of subscribers received at this office.

The fourth annual session of the A. C. Conference will commence on Thursday, the 11th of Sept. in the forenoon, in connection with the camp meeting at Manchester, Delaware county, commencing September 5, and to continue over the 14th. More particulars hereafter. Let all get ready to come. H. H. JAMES.

The annual camp meeting of the Iowa A. C. Conference will be held at Manchester, Delaware county, commencing Sept. 5, and continuing over two Sundays. The camp ground is situated one mile north of the depot, on the same ground as last year. We expect a large and good meeting. Come, brethren and sisters, from east, west, north and south, to this annual feast of tabernacles; come with hearts filled with love to God and man, to labor for the salvation of the perishing; come to get good and to do good. Let there be a generally rally of the lovers of truth (without regard to name or denomination) to this meeting. Let all bring a plenty of bedding; and, all that can, bring tents. Sheeting enough for a family tent will cost but a little, and then the cloth will be as good to make up as before. Straw and hay, for horses, will be provided free. Oats and corn will be furnished cheap. A small victualing stand will be on the ground, and bread, etc., can be got at the bakery, but do not depend upon these—bring your provisions if possible. There will be no boarding tent. Efficient help is expected from abroad to preach the Word.

Business of vital importance will come before this meeting—business that we, as churches and individuals, are interested and concerned in. Let there be a rally then in the name of Israel's God, of both ministers and brethren; yes, and sisters and children. Come yourselves and bring your neighbors; come to work for God and the salvation of sinners; come sanctify a fast to the Lord, and see if he will not pour you out a blessing. Let no small excuse deter you from this feast of tabernacles; come praying in the Holy Ghost that God will bless with the outpouring of his Spirit, that souls may be converted and saints rejoice. Bring tents if possible.

What's the Matter?

GEORGE THOMSON.

[Tune—Ring the Bell, Watchman.]

I.

What mean the tidings that fall on the ear?
What is the message the Watchman doth hear?
Omens are filling the earth and the air.
Rouse up the people, prepare, O prepare!

CHORUS—
Send out the message, loud let it ring,
This is the anthem the pilgrim will sing:
Loud let it echo o'er mountain and plain,
Jesus is coming—is coming to reign.

II.

What makes the nation excited and vexed—
What ails the people, so sadly perplexed;
Why are they looking for something to come,
Do they see the tokens of the soon coming One?
CHO.

III.

What mean the rumblings of earth all around?
Sea and waves roaring—a terrific sound;
Fire, hail and tempest, famine and sword,
Is old earth groaning, and groaning for her Lord?
CHO.

IV.

What ails the Devil that he is so spry—
Marshalling his host to the last battle cry?
See how they rally at their leader's call;
Is it not a presage of the old usurper's fall?
CHO.

V.

What means the echo that thrills o'er the land?
Legions are marching at Jesus' command—
Shouting and singing in unmeasured strain,
Jesus is coming, and is coming to reign.
CHO.—Send out the message, etc.

The Regeneration of the Earth.

"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water: in the habitation of dragons, where each lay, shall be grass with reeds and rushes."—Isaiah 35: 1, 7.

When this earth burst into being from the creating word of the Eternal, it was perfect and glorious in all its parts. Infinite wisdom devised its form, its various divisions and elements, and all its relations. Renewing skill, with all its cunning craft, had perfectly beautified it, and made it supremely grand and gorgeous,—a magnificent habitation abounding in divine blessedness, in which the creature man, the perfect image of the Maker, should dwell, and He should visit and frequently abide with him. Grand in all perfections and adornments, the all-seeing eye of its divine Creator rolling over it, yea, resting upon it in keen scrutiny, in unerring omniscience declared, "All things are very good." Everywhere, fertility revelling in exuberance, clothed it with richest verdure, and the most magnificant and variegated floral robes, which blushed in perfect beauty under the young beams of the infant sun. It was all attired in the gorgeous vestments made by the hand of its creating Lord, and spread itself before His delighted eye, the very perfection of beauty.

But the words of scripture intimate that our world, so perfect and gorgeous in its creation, has undergone a great and melancholy change; and that it is now in sad and mournful ruins. But they also teach, that the present desolations, vast and farspread, and terrible as they may be, shall not alway continue, proclaiming the presence of the curse; that the time of perfect renovation or restitution is approaching, when at the presence of its Regenerator, it shall put on perfection, beauty and glory great and grand, as when the word of God formed it, and His divine hand clothed it with verdure; planted its herbs, flowers and trees, and dressed them and made them supremely beautiful.

It is at this renovation or restitution of our earth to its original perfection and beauty, as taught in this and other passages of scripture, that we propose to glance for a little. In doing this, we notice,

I. The thirsty land shall become pools of water.

All the teaching of the Bible shows, that the earth was in a state of perfection and luxuriant fertility till Adam hearkened to the voice of Eve, and at her persuasive entreaty, ate of the fruit of the tree which God had forbidden them to eat upon pain of death. That wanton act offended the Creator, and in righteous displeasure He said, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake." The terrible sentence took extended and deep effect; the bubbling fountains dried up; the crystal streams which they sent far and wide over the plains, covering them with fertility and beauty, ceased to flow, and vegetation of every kind, deprived of their life-giving influences, withered and died; and the fruitful field became a barren waste, and the verdant plain a howling desert. And hence these far-spreading desolations, where no brook flows, nor spring pours forth its fructifying waters, nor tree grows bearing fruit or yielding shade; no verdure spreads its green and flowery robes; no rose blooms; no bird sings to the dawning of the morn; but dry, sandy sterility, and death and silence, reign.

But these dry barren wastes, limited or vast as they may be, shall not always remain; Jehovah, whose curse for the sin of man produced them, shall, according to prophecy, fully restore them to pristine beauty, when His restituting blessing like a new creative power shall roll over them, then repealing the curse and pouring out the blessing, where it blasted and baned; "the thirsty land shall become pools of water"; fountains shall bubble up everywhere in the dry and dreary desert, and pour their never-to-be exhausted streams, numerous and wide, and deep and far, fertilizing all in their progress, causing reeds, and rushes to spring upon their banks, verdure and flowers to cover the plains, pomegranates and fig trees, fir trees and myrtle trees, oaks and cedars, and olive trees to beautify the waste. Then, the dry and barren wilderness, the thirsty ground, the parched, springless, streamless deserts, shall have no place on our globe; for the blessings of restitution, repealing the curse and restoring original perfection, "the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water." This great restituting change shall be produced by the Lord Jehovah at His coming; for He hath declared it. It is part of His covenant with His people for He has said to them, "Your God shall come with a recompense; then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing; for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water." (Isa. 41; 18.) Here we have the promise of Jehovah, that the dry desert, the result of the curse upon earth for the sin of man, shall, at the coming of our Lord, at the return of the Son of man to earth, be filled with fountains and streams of water, which shall never again be dried up; but which shall flow forever and ever, causing the earth to yield her increase, making her sin-cursed deserts fruitful as Eden and beautiful as the garden of the Lord, while the sun and moon and His name endure.

"Rivers of gladness water all the earth;
And clothe all climes with beauty; the reproach
Of barrenness is past. The fruitful field
Laughs with abundance; and the land once lean,
Or fertile only in its own disgrace,
Exults to see the thirsty curse repealed."

II. The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.

The "desert" means a wilderness, a barren place where the curse has swept away all vegetation, and left little or no green thing. We cannot now survey and describe the small barren places or the vast deserts in various parts which constitute seven-tenths of our globe. We would rather glance at their changed condition as set forth by the beautiful comparison of the prophet. "They shall blossom as the rose" When the Lord comes in His renewing power, to the restitution of earth, the barrenness of the desert shall flee away in greater haste at His presence than the coldness and sterility of winter flee away before the breeze and sunshine of spring. From these desolations, these dismal graves of nature's fertility, grandeur and fragrance, dug by the terrible curse, verdure and floral garniture, and trees of beauty and fruitfulness with the luxuriance of resurrection life or new creation, magnificence shall spring up, displaying the power and delighting the eye of the divine Restitutor, and the inhabitants of the regenerated earth. They shall blossom fresh, luxuriant, beautiful as the rose, the fairest and sweetest of flowers. These completely redeemed from the curse, slain by the blood of atonement, and made very good again, shall form perfect and glorious parts of the new creation. Flowers of every name and hue shall spring from the regenerated bosom of the desert, bloom in paradisiacal perfection and beauty, perfuming the air with their fragrant odors; fertility shall wave her abundant and never-failing harvests over all that was parched ground; the trees on the banks of the new flowing rivers, never to be dried, shall bend perpetually under their burden of fruit, excellent as that on the tree of life in the Eden of God: for then these very desolations shall have become fruitful as the garden of the Lord. The desert shall bloom as the rose in its prime; and that during the eternal spring of the new creation, "it shall blossom abundantly and rejoice even with joy and singing, the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon; they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God."

How beautiful will the earth be, when its very deserts and parched ground becomes fresh, gay, and magnificent as the new blown rose! Did you ever take that beautiful flower and examine its rich colors, its blushing magnificence, inhailing its sweet odor, and say to yourself, and feel what you said, captivated with its grandeur, that is the Lord's symbol of the fertility, beauty and fragrance of the desert, and the wilderness when restituted to the promised Eden condition, and when this earth becomes the habitation of Jesus returned to dwell with men? Ah! you may have looked at the rose a thousand times and admired its beauty, but you may never have looked at it as God's symbol of the blossoming desert in the renewed earth. Look at it in this light in which God presents it, and you will see the wilderness, producing verdure and flowers, until in its new creation it blossoms as the rose.

III. Noxious plants shall give place to healthful and fruitful productions.

If the Bible does not teach directly, it teaches clearly by implication, that previous to the transgression of man, the earth produced no noxious plants. After he had sinned, the Lord said, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake, thorns and briars shall it bring forth." Here is it implied that previous to the curse there were no briars and thorns, nor any baneful plants, and it is clearly taught that they are the direct product of the curse, and the symbols or representatives of all productions hurtful to man; and consequently that all noxious plants of every name, are the products of the curse. As this conclusion cannot reasonably be denied, we are led to another surely taught in prophecy, namely, that when the great Restitutor comes all these shall be forever destroyed; for it declare, "Instead of the thorn there shall come up the fig tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree." He destroys the thorn and the briar, and all that class of productions which they represent offensive and hurtful to man, and forever sweeps them from the earth; and causes the useful and beautiful to spring up and forever occupy their place. Instead of these, the fig tree and the myrtle tree are to spring up and to be "to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off." These trees are representatives of the beautiful, healthful and fruitful trees, fraught with blessings to man, as the others were fraught with curses. And these are to remain on the earth not merely as restituted earth's productions, but also to the Lord for a name or memorial, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off, but that shall remain forever; remain through eternal years, that thorns and briars and noxious plants shall never again mar the beauty of earth, then and forever the garden of the Lord; nor disturb the blessedness of men, its perpetual inhabitants. As the bow in the cloud is the sign of the seal of God's covenant with man, that the waters of a flood shall never again destroy the inhabitants of earth, so the fig tree and the myrtle tree are the sign and seal of God's covenant to the inhabitants of the new creation, that earth shall never again be cursed for the sin of man; and never again produce these plants which shall be hurtful to him. They shall be everywhere, and perpetually the seal of this covenant, that the earth shall remain forever renewed, holy, and blessed, under the eye and smile of Him, who shall claim it as His kingdom, and dwell upon it and reign over it forever and ever.

For the thorn shall give place to the fig-tree of green,
And the myrtle shall flower where the briar-bush hath been:
They shall stand as God's sign, through all ages to be,
That man shall ne'er sin, earth no curse shall e'er see.

John's vision of the new heavens and the new earth shall then be realized And then as he declares, "there shall be no more curse; but the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it, and His servants shall serve Him."

IV. The restituted condition of the earth shall be eternal.

* * * * *

Daniel declares that the dominion which he saw the Son of man receive, "is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and the kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." (Chap. 7; 14.) Since that dominion and kingdom are to be upon this earth, this earth must endure forever. "And there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." (Rev. 11: 14.) All this, and much more, to which we cannot advert now, teach that the renewed earth shall endure forever in unfading perfection and beauty.

Yes, when the springs of water bubble up in the thirsty ground, under the renovating hand of the great Redeemer, they shall bubble up forever. When these floods shall break out in the dry desert, in obedience to His renewing power, they will roll their limpid streams, their fructifying waters, through endless ages. When the desert buds and blossoms as the rose under His fertilizing breath, puts on its mantle of green, trimmed and adorned with all manner of magnificent flowers, eternity's years will not fade its freshness, nor wither its blossoms. When the thorn, the briar, and thistle, had given place to the fig tree and the myrtle, these shall stand in their everlasting freshness the sign of the Lord's eternal blessing to earth. And in this new and eternal earth Christ and His people shall dwell and reign forever and ever, for this is the eternal home of the saints, the inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. Reader, does the Holy Spirit, through faith in Christ, bear testimony to your spirit, that with the Lord Jesus and His saints, you shall inherit forever this glorious new earth? Rest not, till assured of this.—Prophetic Times.

Daily Soul Work.

THE world is full of broad, popular, shallow religious life. There are multitudes of religious books, enterprises, societies, assemblies and associations. There is no doubt much piety, zeal, and enthusiasm in all this, as well as much speech-making, self-praise, and trumpet-blowing.

But men's sins are not pardoned, nor are their souls saved, by the glittering generalities which go to occupy the attention of the religious tumult, if they do not have personal dealings with the Lord.

We must have our daily soul-work between ourselves and God, our secret communion with him, or we shall starve even though surrounded by plenty. We must read our Bibles, do our praying, and believing, and weeping before the Lord, conquer our own enemies in the strength which Jesus gives, and grow in grace and in the knowledge of God singly and in his sight. We cannot be pardoned in masses, or saved in crowds. Strait is the gate, and each must find it and enter it for himself alone. Let us beware lest, in seeking outward excitements, we forget and lose the blessedness of inward Christian life. Let us walk with God.—Sel.

"At the Time of the End shall be the Vision."

P. ALLING.

I will now apply these facts to the prophecies, beginning with the last paragraph.

1. When the papacy was thus restored, at that time she took her position as the Great Babylon, upon the scarlet beast with seven heads and ten horns full of the names of blasphemy.

2. Prior to that time in the symbols of Daniel and Revelation, the appellation of the masculine, as "beast" is used; and why? Because it was a governing power "over all kindreds and tongues and nations." (ch. 13: 7.) The sword and the mitre were a unit during the 1260 years, but not so thereafter.

3. The body of that beast (the scarlet) included all of the "many waters" upon which the woman sat, viz., all of the "multitudes and peoples and tongues and nations" of the prophetic world. (ch. 17: 15.)

4. Those seven heads unitedly constitute the eighth and last form, being a restoring of them all.

5. From the time of that restoration, the harlot woman was sustained by those seven forms; and hence, it may appropriately be said, "she sat upon them." They are now parts of the body of the beast, living realities.

6. This headship, (viz., the allies of Europe,) has governed the prophetic world since that time.

7. The four parts of the metalic image are all in position to be broken, as follows: The feet and the toes of iron and clay are to be found in eastern and western Rome, partly strong and partly broken. The Grecian brass and Persian silver, are living powers. As to the golden part, this must be found in the Apocalyptic Babylon, which sits upon the nations and assumes a kingdom above or superior to them all, as did ancient Babylon, and is the last power to be broken, (see Rev. 16:18,) and all these are under the supervision and control of the allies.

8. The leopard beast of Rev. 13:2, has also an existence and a place in this last form, having been "restored" and caused to "live again" by those allies, and is still "making war against the saints and prevailing." The feet "as of a bear," is to be found in the northern bear of Russia, now rapidly approaching the open "mouth" of the British lion, for the purpose of wresting from "his iron teeth" his ill gotten Indian possessions.

9. As to the number of his name, I will repeat a suggestion often made, That the names of the kingdoms included in the body of the beast go to make up the number 666, and constitute the names of blasphemy of which the "scarlet beast is full." I never have been able to count them; and after about thirty years study upon the subject, have come to this conclusion: That the number is mystical, or legion, and includes not only "the names of the nations," but also all of "the peoples and multitudes and tongues" over which Great Babylon reigns. Now as the pope is in reality the vice-gerent of the devil (instead of Christ), in this number may be included all whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life.

10. These events having transpired in the time of the end when many shall run to and fro and knowledge is increased within the past seventy-five years, and the powers noted are living realities, why may we not accept of them as a fulfillment of the text, "for at the time of the end shall be the vision"? This harmonizes the whole of the visions as seen by Daniel and the Revelator including the past history of the world measured off in parts by the periods of years, from ancient times to the consummation, with a reproduction of those ancient forms of government, marshalled into their exact position they are to be in, as declared by inspiration, when broken without hands, by the King of kings.

[THE END.]

Stand Firm.

AMOS SANFORD.

In the late war I was an union soldier fighting for the Republic. Upon more than one occasion have I seen the commanders pass along the line, while the battle was raging, cheering their men and keeping the ranks closed up, by the command not found in Casey's Tactics,—"stand firm." More than once have I seen the faithfull soldiers overcome the enemy by obeying the command—"stand firm." Returning from the army I enlisted as a "soldier of Christ," and determined not to "learn war any more," from human generals, guided by human tactics. The inspired tactics became my guide, and I tried to obey the command "go forward" as it came passing down the line. My experience in warfare during the last seven years, has been not altogether unlike that of the four preceeding ones. The battles have been frequent and the enemy powerful, who sometimes seemed to gain the advantage. But I still have confidence in our Great General, and through him I expect to overcome, if I "go forward" in the discharge of duty and "stand firm" when the enemy assaults.

Recently I received a postal card message from one who has forsaken all for the Master's cause and is now preaching the Word in Kansas, concluding with the words, "stand firm," written in a bold hand. Reader, did you ever think "how much a word can do?" As I looked at these words, it seemed as though they came from the Master passing down the line to me, his humblest private soldier. They were "meat in due season" to my poor heart. "Stand firm!" For two days these words seemed to be ringing in my ears. "What if I do?" I soliloquized. "You shall overcome." "Then what?" Turning to my Master's tactics I read:

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." (Rev. 2:7.) "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." (v. 11.)

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." (v. 17.)

"He that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my Father: and I will give him the morning star." (vv. 26–28.)

"He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment: and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father and before his angels." (3:5.)

"Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name." (v. 12.)

"To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." (v. 21.)

"He that overcometh, shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son." (21:7.)

None but the King of kings can offer such liberal bounties as these. No fears need be entertained of their fulfillment, if we but "stand firm," for "these are the true sayings of God," (Rev. 19:9,) evidenced by "the faithful and true witness," (Rev. 3 : 14,) who makes every promise good and is our Redeemer as well as King.

In the union army we had to endure hardships, and so in the army of the Lord. Paul says, "Thou, therefore, endure hardships as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." (2 Tim. 2 : 3.) In the next verse may be found the reason why we are not better soldiers. "No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may please him who has chosen him to be a soldier."

"Soldiers of Christ, arise,
And put your armor on;

* * * *

That having all things done,
And all your conflicts past,
Ye may o'ercome, through Christ alone,
And stand entire at last."

Loaves and Fishes.

HIRAM WILLETT.

There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes: but what are they among so many? (John 6: 9.)

The insufficiency of man by the blessing of the Lord may become the sufficiency of God. This feeding of five thousand men, besides women and children, according to Mat. 14 ch., and that they did all eat and were filled, and twelve baskets full of fragments were gathered up, fully demonstrated the power of Christ to work miracles. But what may we learn from the event besides the power to do miracles? In the 14 ch. of Mat. we are told that it was a desert place to which the Savior had retired, but that the people had followed him, and had been there until evening, and that when Jesus saw the great multitude he was moved with compassion and healed their sick, and now knowing that they needed food his compassion was still extended to them, or over them, and when urged by the disciples to send the multitude away that they might supply themselves at their own expense, his answer was that, "they need not depart, give ye them to eat." And when the apparent insufficiency of food was set forth, the Savior in blessing makes it more than sufficient.

We think we are taught these lessons by the results and application of the Savior of this miracle as set forth in this chapter.

1. The compassion of the Son of man and carefulness for the temporal wants of his followers, and also that those who leave all and follow him shall not be losers to their detriment, even in this world. Their sick were healed and when hungry they were fed by the same bountiful hand, demonstrated the teaching of the Savior in Mark ch. 10, "that there is no man that left all for his sake and the gospel's, but shall receive even in this time [with persecutions that is part too of the present things] and in the world to come eternal life." Hence the invitation to all, "go ye also into the vineyard and whatsoever is right that shall ye receive." (Mat. ch. 20.) And who is a better judge of what is right than Christ who calls to us to follow him, and who has the power even to work miracles in our behalf. "No good thing will the Lord withhold from them that walk uprightly." Surely we have great inducements set before us in the Scriptures to walk uprightly for benefits promised even in this world as a recompense. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." And again, "for your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things." (Mat. 6.) Thus the Savior not only taught, but demonstrated by kind acts.

2. Another lesson seems to be a sequel or result to some extent at least of the Savior's kindness in feeding the thousands, and which no doubt is very important to be heeded. We learn from the context that the people who had been fed, again sought the Savior and when they had found him on the other side of the sea, seemed to manifest quite an interest in him by saying, "Rabbi, when camest thou hither?" Let us heed the answer of the Savior as a warning to all who would follow Christ: "Jesus answered them and said, verily, verily, I say unto you, ye seek me not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled. Labor not for the meat which perisheth but for the meat which endureth unto everlasting life. Which the Son of man shall give unto you, for him hath God the Father sealed." Here is evidently set forth the fact that the multitudes who followed Christ and professed to seek him did so for the sake of the loaves and fishes, or in other words, entirely for selfish ends. And we learn too that such characters are soon offended in him.

Jesus admonishes them not to labor for the meat that perishes, but for the meat that endureth unto everlasting life, or as he taught, to seek as first in importance, the kingdom of God and his righteousness or holiness, and that he was the bread of life given from heaven that a man may eat thereof and not die, but which he explains in v. 63 to be received spiritually, not carnally. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth [makes and keeps alive] the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you are spirit and are life," (spiritual food). "From that time many of his disciples went back and walked no more with him." From what time we ask? Surely the Record answers in substance. From the time that Jesus taught a higher order of life, or that their following him must be from higher motives than from mere worldly advantage; follow him by faith discerning in him the true heavenly bread, and that only by partaking of him spiritually can they live forever. I entreat all to try and understand this lesson. Jesus truly has the words of eternal life. Lord, to whom shall we go but unto thee?

The City of Man and the City of God.

The Babylonian empire was founded by Belcois, the Baladen of Scripture, B. C. 747. It arose from the ancient Syrian empire, founded by Nimrod. It reached the summit of its glory under Nebuchadnezzar, who subdued all the kingdoms of the then known world.

The character of this empire is indicated by that portion of the image by which it was symbolized "The head of gold." Truly it was a golden kingdom of a golden age. Babylon, the metropolis of that universal empire, towered far above all other cities of the kingdom. Situated in the garden of the east, it was laid out in a perfect square, 60 miles in circumference, 15 miles on either side, surrounded by a massive wall 87 feet thick and 350 feet high, surrounded by a ditch of equal proportion of the wall; the interior of which was divided up into over 600 squares, with its 225 square miles of inclosed surface. Laid out by streets and with luxuriant pleasure grounds and gardens, some of which were built above the tops of the buildings, supported by pillars, called hanging gardens, having 30 miles of river walls through its centre, and 150 gates of solid brass; its Temple of Belus, three miles in circumference, with two kingly palaces, one three and a half and the other eight miles in circumference, with a subterranean tunnel under the river Euphrates connecting them; and thus, with all the earth prostrate at her feet, she might well say: "I sit a queen, and am no widow;" "peerless in grandeur;" "the glory of kingdoms;" "the beauty of the Chaldees excellency."

Such was Babylon with Nebuchadnezzar, the fearless conquerer, as its king. Here we have the place where Daniel the prophet came to serve as captive seventy years. Here the children of the Lord were oppressed, more than cheered, by the glory and prosperity of the land of captivity. Here they doubtless hung their harps on the willows of the sparkling Euphrates, and wept when they remembered Zion. Here commenced the captivity of the church in a still broader sense; for since that time they have been subject to the powers that rule the earth. And thus they will be in bondage, old earth groaning for the later day of deliverance, until an eternal day shall dawn upon all the ransomed of the Lord. Then, when the King of saints comes, seated on the throne of his glory, shall God's people be admitted into another city. Not only Daniel, but all from the least to the greatest, shall know the Lord and be permitted to walk the streets of gold in the new Jerusalem. A city not 60 miles, but 1,500 (fifteen hundred) miles around; the walls not made of brick and bitumen, but precious stones and jasper; the streets of which are not made of stone, but transparent gold; and the river not the mournful Euphrates, but the river of Life, running through the paradise of God, and the trees of life growing on either side of the river for the use of the nations.

The music will not be the sighs and lamentations of a heart-broken Israel, but heart-thrilling songs of praise, coming from an innumerable company of the redeemed, shouting victory over death and the grave, for "former things shall pass away (Rev. 21:4), and there shall be no more death." "The last enemy shall be destroyed, which is death." The light of the city will not be that of the lamp, or sun, or moon, but the unceasing, resplendent, light of the glory of God and the Lamb. Yes; and not only in this city, 1,500 around, 375 miles on either side, laid out in four square, but the entire earth is to be filled with glory, and grandeur, and blessedness of the Lord.

No chilling words of bondage, sin, servitude or oppression will fall on the ear, to depress the spirits of the people of that clime, for "there shall be no more sorrow; and all tears will be wiped away, and peace and righteousness reign throughout the land.

Then all hearts will rejoice in the salvation of the Lord, who are so unspeakably happy as to be permitted to enter the City of God.

Dear readers, are you waiting, watching, loving the appearing of this glorious day, the coming of Jesus. Not always getting ready, but ever living in a state of safety, waiting the return of the Master, who will grant you his reward. —Selected and reviewed from The Review and Herald, by S. Gratitude.

VERNON HOLMES.

"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?" (Ps. 116:12.)

How replete in beauty is the language of David? With the exception of the book of Job, for simplicity and grandeur, the Psalms stand without a peer among the monuments of poetical literature; and this fact, so generally conceded, is to me a convincing proof that the inspiration felt by David was of a higher order than that obtained by Homer or Milton at the shrine of the muses. Homer and Milton got their inspiration second hand, as it were, while David received his directly from the great Inspirer himself. In the language of the Psalms can be found full, sweet utterance to every emotion of the human heart. In the text I have quoted, the poet is considering the relationship between God and himself. Finding that God's mercies are renewed every morning, and continually showered upon him, he feels himself under an overwhelming debt of gratitude towards God. He realizes, as much as a mortal may, the immensity of the goodness of the Creator toward the created, and remembering the vast difference between the capablilities and resources of God, and the like capabilities in man, he is led to cry out in apparent amazement, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?" A fitting question, indeed; not only for the great king and poet of Israel to ask, but a question befitting the humblest of the sons of men; for where is the man who has not tasted of the mercies of the Lord; yea, and who has not drank deeply at the fountain of all goodness, and may continue to drink as long as he lives? The grateful man listens with sadness to the person who says: "I feel no particular love for God, for the reason that could the question of my coming into the world have been left to me to consider—could I have known beforehand the trials and sorrows of life, I never would have entered upon it." Hence, persons who reason thus of life, refuse to regard their lives a blessing or links in the endless chain of God's mercy, but rather as settled and fixed by the ruling of an inexorable and unrelenting "fate." No wonder that the lives of such are unhappy, and so must it ever be with those who will persist in believing that a something vague, called "fate," is the overruling power.

Gratitude—what is it? It is that feeling in the human heart which, when expressed simply by the upturned face and half tearful eye, is the sweetest form of prayer. Gratitude is the most genuine form of praise. It deals contentment and happiness with a more liberal hand than does any other of the virtues. A man may be simply moral and yet be unhappy; he may be simply pious, yet be more or less discontented; but he cannot be grateful and unhappy at the same time. The grateful man is happy in the meanest condition of life. I know an old man who is the happiest person I ever saw. He tells me he has never had, at one time, one hundred dollars in money. He has reared a large family, and is a man of intelligence. Not possessing a speculative mind for making money, he has been content with the best he could do; and so, being grateful, is always cheerful and happy. Is he not, therefore, a very wise man? How much misery are we apt to cause ourselves by imagining we are born for something great, while in fact we are destined to be but the humblest in God's world of men and women; but for all that we may subserve a grand purpose in the economy of God. God no more intends that every man shall be a Paul, a Cæsar, a Shakespeare, or a Washington, than he does that every shrub in the vegetable world shall bear the queen of flowers. There is plenty of room in our world for any amount of men like Paul, but there is no room in all our great globle for one such man as was Napoleon the first. People generally, at this day (thank God), prefer life by the ploughshare, to death by the sword. So, as the ploughshare brings peace and plenty, perhaps we have reason to feel grateful that we are not all great. Sweet gratitude! She makes the peasant as rich as the king, and the king as happy as the peasant. She caused King David's heart to break forth with the joyful words above quoted. I am sure great and rich King David realized as much joy from the possession of gratitude as did the lowly disciples or poor, persecuted Paul, who could not praise God enough for the mercy of redemption. But there is Charity—I do not forget her. She and Gratitude are twin sisters. Charity gives while Gratitude praises God for the blessedness of giving—and so they go hand-in-hand, these sweet sister virtues, o'er the sin-cursed world; clad in garments of purity, they come bright, willing visitors to each poor, and desponding heart, and while we entertain them they will make us feel that they have power to turn earth into heaven. Ah! poor, wretched man is he whose heart is barred and fortified against the entrance of such messengers as these.

But King David was not so lost in the contemplation of this debt to God, as not to know wherein he might make recompense acceptable to him. In the succeeding verse he answers to himself, "I will take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord." Here we have fully expressed the manner in which the whole obligation is discharged. And when I consider that, while in the discharge of this duty, man is doing that which elevates, refines and ennobles every attribute of his nature, making himself supremely happy in the consciousness of duty well performed, and progress made towards being perfect, even as our Father in heaven is perfect, I feel, too, like saying, "Bless God for such a God."

Improved.

L. F. COLE.

Verily, this is an age of improvement, and the wisdom of this world has made some rapid strides of late. We have heard and sung of the dark river of Death, and thought—with Bunyan—that we must ford the dark, cold, and not particularly cheerful waves, in order to reach the other side; with this thought we have somewhat dreaded the crossing of the flood.

Later wisdom suggested a ferriage, and forthwith there is incorporated in song and prose, "A Boat," and "Boatman," so that the crossing is effected with a comparative freedom from many of the disagreeables which our fathers experienced. The latest idea is, that death is a covered bridge, spanning some sort of an abyss between this world and the [illegible] and, thanks to man's natural [illegible]pendence, he does not even have [illegible] "paddle his own canoe," but ca[illegible] trudge along in his own right, and walk squarely "home to heaven," through this "covered bridge."

This is where men are led when they leave the "old paths," and endeavor to get the reward that is beyond judgment without passing through it.

We doubt not the old Styx river idea, with the bridge improvement, will be eagerly accepted by many, with all its inconsistencies; but let us rather be willing to heed the pure word of God and abide close to Christ, that we may be brought safely through judgment to his kingdom.

Thy Speech Betrayeth Thee.

J. RIDLEY.

Many others besides Peter have been betrayed by their speech, and what they would be very loth to admit in an argument, for fear of overthrowing their theory, is spoken of in the plainest terms under other circumstances, or when they suppose that they are with only those who hold the same theory as themselves.

The above thoughts were suggested by what I heard in a Methodist prayer meeting a few days since. An old gentleman, who probably had been a professor for years, remarked that he had never seen the time when he wanted to die; but, on the other hand he wanted to live. And whenever he had seen any one die he had "always wished that they might live longer." How to understand such statements, if "death is the gate to endless joy," and "man's best friend," I know not. But when we understand that death is an enemy, and one that deprives us of life, and therefore of consciousness, and all of its blessings, all is plain. "O, consistency, thou art a jewel."

I rejoice that, although death is an enemy, Christ has come off conqueror, and is soon to liberate those that are held a captive by it, and will destroy death so that it will no more hold dominion over his precious ones. "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

Cultivate very much the forgiving thoughts towards your fellow-men.

"Elohim."

C. C. M.

It is often claimed by infidels and spiritists that Elohim, the Hebrew for God, is plural in form and therefore should be "gods." The following trite criticism, (and infidels should be aware of it,) clipped from the Advent Review shows the absurdity of this claim:

1. The word, Elohim, is used in the plural form for majesty, and some other words in the Hebrew are used in the same manner. That it is singular in signification is proved by such passages as Ex. 20:2, "I am the Lord thy God;" Deut. 6:4, "The Lord thy God is one Lord," and all places where a singular pronoun is used. And the verb "created," in Gen. 1: 1, is singular—he, not they, created. And so also the other verbs in the history of creation and elsewhere used with Elohim. This use of the plural for the singular as indicative of majesty or power is illustrated by the use of the plural pronoun "we" by kings and governors; but of late it is so extensively appropriated that we loose sight of the original idea of its usage. And, it could not properly be translated "the gods" there being no article, either expressed or implied.

2. It is not translated "Lord God." In Gen. 1, Elohim (God) is used only. In Gen. 2: 4, Jehovah Elohim (Lord God) is used Sometimes one is used; sometimes the other; and sometimes both together. But whether separately or together, they are thus translated: Elohim, God; Jehovah, Lord; and Jehovah Elohim, Lord God

3. The Hebrew word, "El," (Al, nearly as "a" long,) signifies "strong, mighty," and is sometimes used in this form for God, who is the Strong, the Mighty One.

Measuring Earthquakes.

The measurement of earthquake waves, both as to their intensity and direction, has advanced to a surprising degree of certainty. The most systematic observer is Prof. Palmieri, who has established his observatory on a high ridge of the rocks half way up the north side of Mount Vesuvius. The "seismograph" or instrument which he uses for the automatic registration of earthquakes, is carefully and nicely constructed. Its object is to measure the direction and intensity of a shock, and also to write down the history of the earthquake during its occurrence. The shocks may be either vertical or horizontal, or be a combination of the two directions. To measure a vertical shock a fine metallic point is suspended by a coil of wire over a cup of mercury. The slighest upward motion of the earth causes the point to dip into the mercury and complete a galvanic circuit, which stops a clock at the exact half second, and also rings a bell to call the observer. There are also four coils of wire of different strength, each supporting a small magnet over a cup of iron filings. When a vertical shock occurs, the magnets dip into the iron filings, and an index records the intensity of the motion. The horizontal shocks are registered by four glass tubes, each bent twice at right angles, somewhat into the form of the letter U, with one short arm double the diameter of the other. These four tubes are placed in the directions of the four cardinal points of the compass. Each tube is filled with mercury, and on the surface of the mercury in the narrow arm of the tube there rests a small weight attached to a silk fiber, passing over an ivory pulley and counterpoised at the other end. Each pulley has an index and scale to mark the angle passing through. A wire is also fixed at a small distance above the surface of the mercury in each tube. When a horizontal shock occurs, the mercury rises; and, by touching the wire, completes a galvanic circuit, which stops a clock at the half second and rings a bell. The completion of the galvanic circuit also starts a second clock, which allows a roll of paper to be unwound off a drum at the rate of ten feet an hour. By a lever and pencil a continuous history of the earth's trembling is thus registered on the paper. In addition, the most perfect apparatus for detecting and measuring atmospheric electricity is used.—Sel.

The Christian Life.

The Dead.

1 Mournfully, tenderly, bear on the dead,
Where Jesus has lain
Let the Christian be laid;
No place more befitting
Or peaceful can be.
CHORUS:
Never such treasure was hidden in thee;
Never such treasure was hidden in thee.

2 Mournfully, tenderly, solemn and slow,
Tears are bedewing the path as we go;
Kindred and strangers are mourners to day,
Gently, so gently, O bear her away.
CHO.

3 Mournfully, tenderly, gaze on that brow,
Beautiful is it in quietude now.
One look, and then settle the loved to her rest,
The casket about her the turf on her breast.
CHO.

4 So have we buried her up, and depart
To life and to duty, with undismayed heart.
Fear not, for the love of the Saviour will keep
The casket that lies in earth's bosom so deep.
CHO.

5 Peace to thy bosom, thou sweet child of God,
The vale thou art treading by others is trod.
Precious dust thou art laid where thy rest will be sweet,
'Till called by the master to wake from thy sleep.
CHO.

The above was sung by D. R. & M. S. MANSFIELD, at the Funeral of Sr. Carmelia Weaver, Buchanan, Michigan.

The Golden Streets.

1 When we go up the golden streets,
We'll sing the songs of Zion,
As we meet that glorious throng,
Who have sweetly slept before.
In joy we then shall meet
Upon the golden street;
Partings are unknown
Upon that better shore.
CHORUS.—We know the darkest night
Brings sunshine on the morn,
And after death's dark gloom,
Much brighter lights appear;
For there we soon shall meet,
Upon the golden street,
The sweetest heav'nly music
We then, we then shall hear
Don't you see? don't you see?
The better lands before us,
Brighter days will dawn
On you as well as me,
For there we soon shall meet
Upon the golden street,
We'll tune our harps in Zion,
And swell the Jubilee.

2 If trials here below,
Bow down the heart in sadness,
'Tis only for the night;
We shall happy, happy be,
We know there's cheer ahead,
The past is cold and dead;
Better days will dawn,
A welcome sight for thee.

The Road Across the Waters.

One April night, a mammoth ocean steamer went crashing upon the coast of Nova Scotia. There was all the confusion of a wreck at sea, the hopeless cries of men, women and children, the hurrying to and fro, the frantic shouts of the officers, and added to all, came the hoarse cries of the tempest, the surging of the billows, the roar of the breakers.

Between the rock and where the vessel struck was a passage-way a hundred yards wide. A rope was swung across this chasm of death, and by this line many of the dark group of survivors, one after another, successfully struggled to the shore.

Dear friend, had you been there, would you not have pressed aside all possibilities of harm, and cried "Let me grasp it?"

The waves of death must overtake unpardoned sin. The one rope to save you is the help of the Lord Jesus Christ. Over the dark chasm between earth and heaven is swung this only hope of safety. Cling to it, for your eternal life.—American Messenger.

Respect for the Aged.

One of the many good laws given to the Jews was meant to teach respect to old age. In Leviticus xix 32, we read: "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of the old man, and fear thy God: I am the Lord." The last words of this verse show how much God thinks of this command, and how angry He will be with those who do not keep it. If such a law were binding on the Jews, it must be much more binding [illegible] a Christian. If God were angry [illegible] those who broke the law then, He must be more angry with those who break it now. Even that ancient people, the Egyptians, seem to have known how wrong it was for young persons not to treat the old with proper respect. Rollin says, "The young were obliged to rise up before the old, and on every occasion to resign to them the most honorable seat. And yet the Egyptians were far more ignorant than ourselves; they had no Bible to teach them about God and his holy laws. Surely, then they might rise up in judgment against many of our own young people, who do not try to please their Heavenly Father by showing respect to the aged.—Selected.

Rock me Father.

As my boy grew very sick, the medicine was exceedingly disagreeable to him, so much so that he refused to take it. But I told him he must. Then lifting his eyes to mine, he said, "If I drink it, will you rock me, father, and sing to me?" "Yes, yes, my good boy, take it, and I will." With that assurance, summoning all his flagging powers, he drank the bitter draught. Then laying his burning cheek on mine, he said, "Now, father, rock me, sing to me."

"The lesson my boy taught me is this: when my heavenly Father mingles a bitter cup, and pressing it to my lips, says, 'Drink it,' I will obey. Then will He rock me in His strong arms of love, and sing to me the precious words of His promises. Oh! how sweet.

Afflicted one, is it not a truth, a great and blessed truth, declared in the word of God and confirmed by Christian experience, that, like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him?" And when the humble disciple can follow the Master into the soul's Gethsemane, and there repeat his words, "O, my Father, if this cup may not pass from me except I drink it, Thy will be done," then will He rock him in the tender arms of his love, and sing to me words of promise sweeter than ever fell on angel's ear.—Congregationalist.

Instant In Prayer.

Speaking of prayer, at the anniversary of the London Missionary Society, Mr. Spurgeon said, "Oh for more prayer! I had an odd illustration of its power the other day, in Italy. In the hotels there, there are little ivory buttons in the wall upon which you put your finger. They communicate with electric wires which ring the bell down-stairs. A friend came in to take tea with us, and I put my finger on the button, but nobody came. I did it again; still nobody came. 'Now,' said my friend, 'I will put you up to a wrinkle—keep your finger on the button. If you only just put it on, it rings the bell; but if you keep your finger on, the bell will keep ringing down-stairs.' Well, I did so; but even then the waiter did not come. At length my friend said, 'We have a couple of rooms here; I will go into one, and your friend can go into the other; let us ring all three bells, and then we shall fetch up all the waiters in the hotel.' So we put our fingers on the three buttons, and kept them there, and, I warrant you, the passage was soon full of waiters tumbling over one another. They thought the whole house must be on fire. We simply explained that as the ringing of one bell did not do, we thought we would ring all three, and found it a capital plan; but if they would only come more quickly another time we would do it no more. Every time a man prays he rings the great bell in heaven! If two of you agree as touching anything concerning the kingdom, it shall be done unto you. There is no resisting it. If every man and woman here would begin to put their fingers upon the bell, the electric communication between earth and heaven, [illegible] like the very angels, and bring them down with untold blessings upon the church and upon the world."—Sel.

THOU can'st not do one good thing, nor overcome the weakest enemy, nor take one step in the way to heaven, without Christ.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, August 26, 1873.

Board Meeting.

The members of the Board of the W. A. C. Publishing Society are hereby notified that a meeting of the Board will be held on the 16th day of Sept., 1873, at the office, No. 25 West Lake street, Chicago. The object of said meeting is to either cancel its debts in full, or to lease the property to a party or parties (if they can be found in whom the board has confidence), who will publish the A. C. TIMES in harmony with the requirements of the lease, and assume the debts.

D. MATHEWSON. President.

READ Dr. Field's article in this number, and decide whether you will act on his suggestion.

THOSE who wish to read an argument on the termination of the prophetic periods, are referred to Br. Wolcott's offer on the last page.

BRO. C. P. CONOLLY, of Jacksonville, Florida, has recently published a tract of 16 pp. to scatter in that region, entitled "An exposition of the parable of the ten virgins."

MANY hearts will be made sad to learn that Eld. Jonas Wendell died August 7th. We have known him for long years as an ardent preacher; but he has fallen asleep.

PAY full postage on all letters sent to this office. We are constantly paying dues on letters that are only partly stamped. This soon makes quite a tax on the office.

WE hope that the Mission Society, to meet at Springfield this week, will consider the wants of the Southern field, and send proper men to proclaim the truth in that destitute region.

BR. J. C. SHAW is the first one to return a pledge—$30 for himself and wife to help blot out the debt, and says he is "glad to have a chance to sacrifice." Let a whole army imitate his example.

THE National Camp-meeting to be held at Springfield, Massachusetts, began August 23. We trust it will send out an influence into all the surrounding regions that shall give new vitality to the cause of Christ.

BRN. WILSON and REED, now on a mission in Oregon, are having a good hearing, and the truth is being planted in that new field. If we had more such sacrificing men to open new fields the result would soon be apparent.

DO NOT send matter for the paper to Brodhead Wis., but to 25 West Lake Street, Chicago. Private letters may be sent to Brodhead, if preferred, or to 25 West Lake Street, by writing "Personal" on the outside of the envelope.

WE trust our autumn camp-meetings in every part of the land will be characterized by two essential features—a proclamation of "the gospel of the kingdom," and a preparation to enter it. Our specific message must be made prominent on such occasions. It will not do to keep it in the background.

IT is not our intention to monopolize so much space for editorials as we have been doing, after a short time. Thus far it has been rather necessary, owing to a scarcity of articles suited to our columns, which is often the case in the summer season, when there is little leisure for writing in the rural districts, where other duties take the attention.

WE fear that some of our brethren are imitating the horse on the bridge, who runs off on one side to prevent falling off on the other. They think they see ruin growing out of the dogmatical stand taken by some on the '73 time, and hence repudiate time entirely. Be cautious, Brethren. If some are too sanguine, do not repudiate God's great time-chains. We may yet have clearer light.

LET it be understood that we desire the presence of all our brethren that can possibly come, at our approaching Board meeting, in addition to members of the Board. "In a multitude of counselors there is safety." We wish to do nothing that will not suit the friends at large, and we wish their counsel before acting. We hope the necessity for action may be obviated by a prompt response to our call for pledges.

WE call the attention of the Wisconsin friends to the notice of the Southern camp-meeting at Belleville, September 6. The notice is short, but we hope to see the meeting well attended. Also, let friends in the northern part of the State attend the northern meeting, beginning a little later. We hope the Illinois Brethren will rally to their meeting with usual promptness. Trust we shall hear a cheering report from all of these meetings.

A SISTER inquires: "What do you think about secret societies? Is it right for Christians to join them—say for instance, the Masons?" We think it best to belong to the society organized by Jesus—his church—and if we live up to its regulations, we doubt whether any other society can improve upon it. This society needs our funds and time. Worldly societies look after worldly interests, though they may have moral features; but the church of Christ is the highest society on earth, and not only leads us in the right path in this world, but prepares us for the next. If any other society can do the same, we might pause to choose between them.

Self-Examination.

The following admonition is too much neglected: "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?"-(1 Cor. 13:5.)

A Christless substitute for religion will avail us nothing in the day of judgment. "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." A religion that will merely give us a fair standing among men, and fail us at the judgment seat of Christ, is worse than no religion; for it deceives us and staggers others. Since there is a genuine and a spurious article let us make a timely and thorough examination, and learn whether we are deficient in the work of preparation, in time to obtain a remedy; for when the day of God's examination arrives and we are all "weighed in the balances" that will tell with infallible precision how much godliness we possess, if "found wanting" it will be too late to effect the desired change. Now is the time to enter into the work of examination.

1. We do not now speak of a theological examination, though it is well to examine our theories also; but the examination now under consideration is of a different nature. It is to be regretted that there are those with unsanctified hearts and enlightened intellects who are ambitious only for an examination of theology, regardless of their hearts; but the examination now proposed pertains to character, or the state of the heart.

2. Nor should we, in our efforts to examine character, turn our eyes to our neighbors, or say to our brother, "Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye," while there may be a "beam" in our own eye. How prone we are to examine our brethren, instead of examining our own hearts. We open our eyes wide when we look at our neighbors, but instinctively shut them when we pretend to look at self; so we readily behold all the existing moral deformities in others, but see none in ourselves.

3. Nor do we here speak of examination of character from a moral standpoint, but from an experimental basis. The righteousness that springs only from morality is like the body without the spirit—dead. Morality is good as a fruit on the tree of holiness, but it will never do as a tree on which to raise the fruit of holiness. In other words, morality may spring from holiness, but holiness never springs from morality.

Then, in our examination, we need to begin with experimental religion, the only true basis of practical religion; for practical religion (another name for morality) is destitute of a saving quality unless it springs from an experience that makes the heart right. The heart or the affections of man, must be first taken out from under the control of carnality and be placed under the control of the divine Spirit: "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."-(Rom. 8:2.) The work of regeneration takes a man out from under the carnal law and places him under a new administration—"the law of the Spirit." The modus operandi of the transition from the carnal to the spiritual state is thus mentioned by Paul: "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? .... And such were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."-(1 Cor. 6: 6, 11.) "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body."-(1 Cor. 12: 13.)

Are we strangers to this work of regeneration which is wrought by the Holy Spirit? Then we have not started on the right road, and need to start anew; for no other road than that of true regeneration leads from carnality to the kingdom of God. The washing, the sanctification, the justification that comes through the Spirit is needed to fit us for a home in God's Paradise. When we have experienced this we can realize the sweetness of Paul's language: "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." -(Gal. 4:6.) Sent what? "The spirit." Sent it where? "Into your hearts?" Have we felt its gladdening power?

But we do not wish simply to learn whether we at first made a right start, but whether we are now "in the faith," or, whether now we have "Christ formed within us, the hope of glory;" for "Christ is in you except ye be reprobates." The command is, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption." Have we crowded this Spirit out of our hearts? Have we lost our "first love?" Do we now belong to the ranks of the class thus addressed by Paul: "Ye did run well; who hath hindered you?" Are we standing still? or retrograding, while we ought to be advancing?

"Examine your own selves." Should we not grow in grace as well as in the "knowledge of the truth?" Are we not to be saved "through sanctification of the Spirit" as well as through "the belief of the truth?" And is not God's plan right? We can live in a higher atmosphere of spiritual life than we at first entered. We can get into deeper waters of divine love than when we first stepped off the shore of carnality. Why linger around the shore? Launch out into the ocean of "perfect love." Why halt between the attractions of earth and the charms of Christ? Why not place all on the altar? Why not fully break affinity with the world? Finally, not content to ask, Is not this the right position for a saint to occupy? I go one step further and ask, Are you now occupying it? Have you a constant feast of "perfect love?" Let our prayer be, "Nearer, my God, to thee, nearer to the."

Infinite Sin.

The advocates of endless misery as the punishment due sinners, while opposing the doctrine of destruction, sometimes inquire, with an air of triumph, if destruction is not a finite punishment, and if sin against an infinite God is not infinite sin, and if it does not therefore call for an infinite punishment? Where do we read in the Bible either about an infinite sin, or an infinite punishment? In our "Life and Death Theology," we made the following remarks on this point:

We frequently hear the affirmation that sin against an infinite God calls for an infinite punishment. It is just as much impossible for a finite man to commit an infinite sin, as for a stream to rise higher than its fountain. To claim that a child three years old, who had disregarded a prohibition against entering the royal palace of a king, should be entitled to the same severity of punishment for the act as though it had been a man, on the plea that the crime was against a king, instead of an equal, would be deemed inhuman. Who would say that this act of disobedience should be punished strictly and exclusively with reference to the high-standing of the person disobeyed, and with no reference to the standing of the offender? Yet this is but a faint comparison. There is a vastly greater contrast between God and man than between the king and child. Think of the wisdom and justice of God, as portrayed to us in the Bible, and then think of him in the light of modern theology, inflicting endless torment on millions of his creatures! Take the little child who has just crossed the line of accountability, and has committed the first sin, and that sin of the smallest magnitude, and dies in the act. Can it be that God will consign it to an endless hell of suffering and torment, to writhe in anguish, to shriek in hopeless misery, to wail in excruciating agony, with no chance for release, no hope for relief, no prospect of respite or mitigation of wo, while God lives, simply because the sin was against an infinite being? Is his anger infinite? Will he keep his anger forever? or will he cause his anger to "cease" in their "destruction?" "His anger endureth but a moment." (Ps. 30:5.) "He will not always chide: neither will he keep his anger forever." (Ps. 130: 9.)

Sin will not always exist—it is the very element that God abhors; it has caused all the misery that has flooded the world. God will not eternal keep it in existence, but will blot it out forever. Misery cannot outlive sin. Sin and misery are inseparable: sin is the fountain, and misery is the stream that flows from it. God will dry up both the fountain and the stream. "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil" (John 3:8); which cannot be fully accomplished until the devil himself is destroyed; and in due time Christ will "destroy him that had the power of death; that is, the devil." (Heb. 2:14). Then we shall have a clean universe—no sin, no misery, no devil, no sinners, no death, no pain, no sorrow—"God shall be all and in all," iniquity having been submerged beneath the dark waves of oblivion, and the saints left alone to enjoy righteousness unmixed with sin, and undisturbed by the walls of dispairing millions, amid the glories of Paradise restored. Blissful era of sinless and deathless perfection!

"Not Accepting Deliverance."

Paul speaks of a class of the ancient worthies who were "tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection"—not that they might be ushered into the glories of a disembodied state—thus showing that the ancient saints looked for reward in the resurrected state, and not at an earlier epoch.

In harmony with this view, we read in 2 Machabees, 7 ch., of the torture of seven brothers and their mother, who persistently refused to violate the law of Moses, even though deliverence was offered them on conditions they would obey King Anteochus, and transgress God's law. Though the mode of torture was terrible, they refused to accept deliverance, steadfastly expressing their faith in a resurrection to eternal life. The torture was after this manner: They were "tormented with whips and scourges," and had their tongues cut out, their heads scalped, their hands and feet cut off, and were then personally thrown into a frying pan. Beginning with the eldest son, this practice was gone through with in presence of the others, to induce them to recant, till the last one expired without finching, being sustained by the hope of a resurrection to eternal life, and not by the hope of disembodied felicity. After the death of the first one, the second entered upon his torture saying; "Thou indeed, O most wicked man, destroyest us out of this present life: but the King of the world will raise us up, who die for his laws, in the resurrection of eternal life." Another gave the following testimony: "It is better, being put to death by men, to look for hope from God, to be raised up again by him." Not one of the seven exulted in view of a state of intermediate glory, but all looked joyfully forward to the better resurrection. They looked upon death as real, and expected a release from it by a resurrection to endless life, which they deemed preferable to the present life. At a later date the theory of a disembodied existence of the soul was incorporated into the faith of a part of the Jews, which view was borrowed from the heathen, together with the theory of its underground home.

Indispensible Knowledge.

There is a kind of knowledge that "puffeth up," and there is also a kind of knowledge that ranks among Christian graces. The former fits its possessor to shine in this world, while the latter fits him to shine in the world to come. What will worldly wisdom avail us at the judgment seat of Christ, if then found destitute of the knowledge of the Lord? While it is well to gain information concerning the present world, and to make a proper use of that knowledge, it is better to secure that kind of knowledge that will qualify us to enter the coming kingdom of God. Dr. Guthrie has well said:

> "A man may know all about the rocks, and his heart remain as hard as they are; a man may know all about the winds, and be the sport of passions as fierce as they; a man may know all about the stars, and his fate be the meteor's, that, after a brief and brilliant career, is quenched in eternal night; a man may know all about the sea, and his soul resemble its troubled waters, which cannot rest; a man may know how to rule the spirits of the elements, yet know not how to rule his own; a man may know how to turn aside flashing thunderbolts, but not the wrath of God from his own guilty head; he may know all that La Place knew—all that Shakespeare knew—all that the greatest geniuses have known; he may know all mysteries and all knowledge, but if he does not know his Bible, what shall it avail? I take my stand by a dying philosopher as well as of a dying miser, and ask of all the world's wisdom as of the world's wealth, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"
> I despise not the lights of science; but they burn in a dying chamber as dim as its candles.

They cannot penetrate the mists of death, nor light the foot of the weary traveler on his way in that valley through which we have all to pass. Commend me, therefore, to the light which illumes the last hour of life—commend me to the light that can irradiate the face of death—commend me to the light that, when all others are quenched, shall guide my feet to the portals of that blessed world where there is no need of sun, and no need of the moon, and no need of any created lights, for God and the Lamb are the light thereof. Brethren, leave others to climb the steeps of fame—brother, sister, put your feet upon the ladder that scales the sky; nor mind though your brows are never crowned with faded bays, if you win, through faith in Jesus, the crown of eternal life."

Paul and the Philosophers.

Now while Paul waited for them at Athens, his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry. Therefore disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews, and with the devout persons, and in the market daily with them that met with him. Then certain philosophers of the Epicureans, and of the Stoics encountered him because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection. (Acts 17: 16-18.)

The philosophers who encountered Paul to oppose the doctrine of the resurrection, were not in harmony among themselves, the Epicurians denying any future life or future reward to any of the race, claiming that death was eternal; while the Stoics claimed that a part of man continued to live on after the death of the body; which they insisted would never live again. These philosophers, thus at variance among themselves, could unite in opposing the doctrine of the resurrection. If philosophy is the standard to which inspiration must bend, why is it thus in conflict? To which system of philosophy must we warp the Bible, if to any? To that of the Epicurians, or the Stoics?

When philosophy assumes to be the standard, thus belittleing inspiration, we are them left to determine which system of philosophy is preferable, and when we have made our choice, it is not certain that we have made the best selection. Surely these are poor standards to interpret inspiration by. The philosophy which sets aside a future life entirely, and the philosophy which gives a future life without a resurrection, are alike antagonistic to the gospel preached by Paul—"Jesus and the resurrection." Said Paul, "Why should it be thought a thing incredible by you that God should raise the dead?" Philosophy says it is impossible. Paul affirmed, "The dead shall be raised." Philosophy says that the soul only can live after death. Paul affirmed, "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain." Paul saw no future life except through Jesus at the resurrection. Philosophy sees no future life at all, except by assuming the immortality of the soul, which is not susceptible of philosophical or Biblical proof.

God Seen---A Savior.

BRO. SHELDON:—Please answer the following questions if you can:

1. How could Jesus say, "No man hath seen God at any time" (John 1:18, and John also say the same, 1 John 4:12), when it is recorded of "Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu and seventy of the elders of Israel, that they "saw the God of Israel" (Ex. 24:10.)

What is the meaning of the Greek and Hebrew words rendered God in these passages?

2. In Isaiah 43:11 we read: "I am the Lord, and beside me there is no Savior." If Christ existed at that time how could such an affirmation be made? E. A. MARSH.

1. No man with natural vision has seen God, but for His glory, He has permitted some to behold him with supernatural vision. The Hebrew word Elohim means "superior, mighty, supreme." The Greek, Theos, has a similar meaning.

2. God is a Savior only on the principle of saving through his Son, just as he will judge the world by Him, and raise the dead by Him—just as he "made the Kosmos" by him. (John 1:10.) At the time these words were uttered, though Christ existed under the name of the "Logos," he had not entered upon his office as a Savior. Men were then saved by a system of types pointing to a coming Savior, to be slain and raised again.

Devils.

JOSEPHUS speaks of an ancient tradition concerning "those called demons, which are no other than the spirits of the wicked, that enter into men that are alive, and kill them, unless they can obtain help against them." (Wars. B. 7, C. 6, Sec. 3.)

The modern claim that the spirits of wicked men, after death, become devils, is the old tradition revived and revised—the revision consisting in sending them to hell, instead of allowing them to enter the bodies of living men to torment them, and kill them. But if the spirits of wicked dead men are really transformed into devils, where did the original devil, who figured so conspicuously through his chosen medium, come from? What man died before the "first man," Adam, was made, out of which to manufacture this devil? Are there two ways of making devils?

Both Victorious.

Not long since, while traveling on the cars, we listened to a conversation between two gentlemen on the question of life after death, one taking the position that there was a disembodied state between death and the resurrection, and the other advocating our views. While the latter gentleman evidently had the strength of argument on his side, he weakened his argument by spicing it with temper and sarcasm; while the other gentleman, though weak in argument, gained the favor of candid listeners by his kind and candid spirit. Both had gained a victory—the one by argument, and the other by candor. How much better to let candor go with the argument, thus gaining a double victory.

Home Religion.

There are many excellent meeting-christians, who seem to enjoy themselves hugely at the house of worship, but are persistently and perpetually fretting at home. Is this the fruit of true religion? Said John Wesley: "I dare no more fret than to curse and swear." If others could share Wesley's feeling on this point, it would wonderfully augment their watchfulness, and this watchfulness would forestall a vast deal of condemnation, and perpetuate inward peace. Let us enjoy religion at home as well as in the house of worship—not the fretting kind, but that kind which is "first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits."

When Did the Thieves Die?

BRO. SHELDON:—Will the scriptures sustain the view that Christ died on Thursday, and that the thieves died on Friday? Please answer through THE TIMES.

Yours in hope, J. AUGUST SMITH.

That Christ was crucified and died on Thursday, we have no doubt; but we have no proof that the thieves died on Friday, or even Saturday; indeed we have no account of their death at any epoch. It is probable that they died in a few hours after Jesus did, but this is not proof. Under such circumstances they often lived for days. Our opponents cannot prove that the thieves died on the same day that Christ did, nor that they died that same week even. They can guess so, but proof is another thing.

The White Stone.

BR. SHELDON:—Will you please explain through THE TIMES the last part of the 7th verse of the 2d ch. of Rev., and "will give him a white stone and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it," and oblige, yours in the blessed hope, D. O. AMOS.

Fort Scott, Kan., Aug. 12, 1873.

The figure is drawn from an ancient practice, in which, when two friends entered into a covenant of perpetual friendship, they took a white pebble, divided it, and inscribed a name on each half—which was deemed equivolent to a pledge of eternal friendship. Such a covenant will Christ make with the overcomer.

How can the Debt be Paid?

N. FIELD, M. D.

Suppose we try the following experiment: Let 400 persons agree to give ten dollars ($10) each on or before the 1st of January, 1874, and pay according to promise. I will be one of the number, and herewith send my obligation for the donation. Now, let 399 more do the same, and the means to pay the debt of the publishing society can be furnished.

Brethren, come forward with your pledges and do it in good earnest and good faith. Don't raise the old and obsolete cry of hard times; I have heard that all my life; and if money was as plenty as the leaves on the trees, some men would out-trade it and be hard run. Money is more abundant at the present time than it has been since the foundation of the goverment of the United States. You will never have any better times in the temporal affairs of our country. No matter how prosperous the country may be, times will always be hard with indolent and extravagant people. Industry, frugality, and economy will fill your pockets with money and drive hard times from your door.

The names of the contributors to the fund should be published that we may know when enough is pledged to pay the debt.

A Protest.

D. R. MANSFIELD.

In the Times of August 19th a call is made by Br. Mathewson for a Board meeting—the object of which is to pay the indebtedness of the publishing Society—or lease the property of the Society to a party or parties (in whom the Board have confidence) upon conditions that they assume and pay the indebtedness of the Society; and at a meeting of several of the brethren at 25 West Lake street, a resolution of the same import was passed. Now, Br. Editor is this acting in good faith; is this doing as we would be done by. The basis of the Association was changed, that the publishing interest might be placed under the control of the Advent people, and the change was argued and consummated upon that ground alone. And now I would like to know by what authority the Board of the new Society can sell out to a few individuals property belonging to the Advent people, and as a stockholder of the old Association I protest against such action. If the people refuse to pay the debts they have assumed, the lease is made null and void and the property reverts back to the old Association, and the object for which we have labored will be defeated. We were assured that as soon as a change of basis was completed, the publishing cause should not want for money, that brethren of means would come to the rescue and relieve the Society from financial embarrassment, but thus far we have been disappointed, and all our hopes for the future in that direction have been blasted. But the same kind Providence that has been over us in the past, will direct us in the future if we are true to our trust, and the people who have sacrificed so nobly in the past to publish the last great message to a perishing world, will not allow the truth to be silenced upon the eve of the judgment and at a time when the Macedonian cry is heard from every quarter.

HE that hath tasted the bitterness o sin will fear to commit it; and he that hath felt the sweetness of mercy will fear to offend it.—Charnock.

He was about thirty years of age, five feet six inches in height, and of light complexion.

—A bold attempt has been made to break from Richmond County Jail and but for the information by a prisoner it would have been successful. The convicts had a shovel for clearing ashes and coals. They dug under the bath tubs, cut off the supply and waste pipes, and had made every arrangement to flee. Twenty-one convicts would certainly have escaped had not information been promptly given to the authorities.

—A terrible accident occurred near Lemont, on the Chicago and Alton Railroad. An incoming freight train came in collision with the south bound express passenger train, almost entirely wrecking the latter, killing six persons outright and fearfully injuring some thirty-five others many of whom, it is said, will die. The regular passenger train for St. Louis left Chicago at 9 p. m. and consisted of a baggage car, express car, and three day coaches, the head one a second-class or smoking car and two sleepers. At 10; 20 p. m when three miles north of Lemont, and about 22 miles south of this city, at a curve in the road, suddenly appeared a coal train of 35 cars, running at the rate of about 20 miles an hour. The passenger train was running at the rate of probably 30 miles an hour, and neither engineer saw the other's engine until it was too late to reverse, a fact accounted for by the curve in the road, and partly by the dense fog. The two trains came together with fearful force. Being on the curve, however, each engine left the track and passed each other, that attached to the coal train striking the baggage car a few feet from the end, breaking the coupling between it and the smoking car, which the engine struck square in the end and with such force as to throw the forward end in the air, so that the engine ran under it, tearing the floor completely out and hurling the fifty or sixty unfortunates who were in the car in a struggling mass to the lower end where there was no chance to escape, and then ensued a scene of horrors which cannot adequately be described. The smokestack and dome of the engine were knocked of by the collision, and the broken timbers of the smoking car penetrated the boiler, letting loose a dense volume of hot steam, which poured into the car, blinding and scalding the helpless inmates, who with shrieks struggled vainly to extricate themselves. Meantime, Conductor Russell of the passenger train, who was unhurt, and a number of passengers from the rear coaches came forward and endeavored to assist the poor victims, but there was little left to do beyond taking from the wreck the dying and wounded, many of whom were fearfully scalded. Seven died soon after they were taken out, and four have since died.

The cause of the accident was the criminal carelessness of the conductor and engineer of the coal train, whose duty it was to wait at Lemont until the passenger train had passed, unless they had received positive orders to proceed. This, the officers of the road say was not the case, and that the coal train should have stayed at Lemont. The conductor of the coal train, named Beane, had been running the train for a year, and was considered a first-class man. He has not been seen since the disaster, and it is thought he has escaped and fled, as the last seen of him he was in the caboose of his train, which was uninjured.

The following is a list of the killed: John Mitzk. [illegible] eer, belonging to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; two firemen belonging to the colliding trains, names unknown; Frank Bridges, apparently a fireman; N. Divelbiss, jr., of Springfield, Ill, Thomas Martin, porter in Anderson's Hotel, Chicago; R. J. Bross, of the firm of J. V. Farwell & Co., Chicago; two men whose bodies are yet unidentified.

Mr. Burgess, of the Pullman car on the train which was wrecked near Lemont. Ill., describes the results as follows: In the meadows on either side of the track were lying human beings, yelling in agony-their flesh boiled off them. The freight engine had run clean underneath the smoking car, and there exploded, shattering the car into little pieces, and blowing the occupants high up into the air and over the fence into the meadows. The other engine burst at the same time. A man—I don't know who it was—ran up to me shrieking with agony, and threw himself into my arms, I tried to hold him, but his clothes tore off him, and the flesh came off with them. I was nearly stunned at the sight. There were a dozen or more, stripped stark naked, running up and down, crazy with pain. They were tearing at their bodies, and tearing off great handfuls of flesh. The passengers behaved admirably. They took up the victims and carried them into the coaches. I told them to bring them into the sleeping car, and they did. First thing I knew, the ladies–God bless them! —were tearing up their under-clothing to bind up the sufferers. Why, sir, in half a minute they had scarcely anything left on them. There was around one mans hand a lace handkerchief which must have cost a small fortune. I could not stand that any longer. I did not care what the company said, so I just gave orders to open the lockers and tear up anything that came handy. And they did. There were two or three ladies tearing up sheets into lengths to bind up wounds, while half a dozen others were binding them around the bloody arms and bodies of the wounded [illegible]

The Value of Small Things.

Some people are always complaining about their small talents, and their inability to do, or say, anything that will be of use to anybody; and they seem to forget that a small seed, if watered and cared for by the Lord, will produce a plant or a tree that will be noticed and admired by all that pass by it, and will yield much fruit to benefit mankind. Though the "beginning was small, yet the latter end shall greatly increase."

How often do we hear of the mother's tears and prayers, which of themselves are small, result in bringing a wayward son from the service of Satan to God, or a tract awakening some hard sinner and leading a whole ship's company to the foot of the cross, or the broken testimony of one who felt herself to be the smallest of all the Lord's children reaching the heart of some that the preacher's eloquent appeal or the testimony of those that had a good command of language could not penetrate.

But there has lately come under my personal observation a circumstance which I wish to relate for the benefit of those who think that they cannot do anything, that they may be led to take courage and "go and do likewise." It is the good that was accomplished by the small sum of thirty-five cents. During our campmeeting in M. last fall Br. L. subscribed for THE TIMES and had it sent to his father-in-law three months on trial, for which he paid thirty-five cents.

The old gentleman had been very much prejudiced against our views, and when the first numbers of the paper came he would hardly touch them; but after a while he began to read and compare them with the Bible, and when the three months were out he had become so much interested that he subscribed for the paper himself. He also lent some of them to his neighbors, which stirred up an interest to hear, so they sent for me to come and preach to them. I heeded the call and have preached to them two Sundays and a few evenings, and have baptized seven, among whom was the one that took the paper, and his three sons. And others have promised to be baptized the next opportunity. I also organized a church of nine members, all heads of families.

All of this fruit, and much more that will be produced, grew from that trifling sum of thirty-five cents sown in subscribing for THE TIMES. "Go thou and do likewise."

From E. E. Goff, Hillsdale, Mich.

I will do all I can to help pay the debt, for I love THE ADVENT CHRISTIAN TIMES. It is about the only preaching I have of the Advent faith, and it does me good to read the letters from my brothers and sisters. I am not numbered with the Adventists in name, but, being the same in faith, I feel a great interest in them as a people of God; and as we are his children let us do good unto all men, especially to the household of faith. Let each give, as the Lord has prospered us, and the debt will soon be paid. May the Lord lead us to be diligent in this matter, for he loves the cheerful giver.

From Mrs. J. Eaton, Little Falls, N. Y.

I could not do without THE TIMES, having taken it ever since it had a being; it is all the preaching I have. I love to hear from the children who are looking for that blessed hope My heart is made to rejoice as I read in the blessed word of God of the beautiful promised rest, and I long for it to come. O happy thought, that God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes.

We may not have where to lay our heads on this earth, that we can call our own, yet thank the Lord, every child of his will have a home in the New Earth that will be everlasting. May the Lord guide us all into a patient waiting for his Son from heaven is my prayer.

From Wm. Branch, Woodbridge, Mich.

I have just returned from Ohio, where I had the privilege of burying two happy souls in the liquid grave, who had come more than twenty miles for that purpose. May the Lord bless Srs. Bundy and help them to faithfully discharge every duty, and at last, with all the redeemed, enter the everlasting kingdom of God. Br. Barkholder and others were there from Fulton county, and the Macedonian cry was "Come over and help us." So we promised to spend Sunday, August 24, with them if the Lord permits. The work is great and the laborers few, and it becomes us all to work with our might to bring sinners to Christ. Let us be faithful, the kingdom is at hand.

From P. Alling, Norwalk, Ohio.

The labors of Br. F. Burr in this place are appreciated, and prospects are favorable for the accomplishment of much good. He seems to be the right man in the right place, and I trust the work of the Lord will prosper in his hands. The church, as well as outsiders, are interested in his preaching and labors of love for the advancement of Bible truth. We feel to sympathize with the brethren in Chicago for their loss, and hope his place may be speedily filled with an equally efficient and faithful laborer. The cause is one—here, there and elsewhere—and each member should have the same care and sympathy for all, as does Christ, our living head, for the members of his own scattered and trodden down body throughout the world.

From G. T. Cranston, Lafayette, R. I.

Dear brethren and sisters of the blessed hope, I read with great interest your letters from week to week, and rejoice to hear you tell of your faith and hope. I have been in the good way for three years, and by the help of God will walk therein till Jesus comes, though I may be cut down in death; if so, my flesh shall rest in hope—the hope of the resurrection of the dead.

The long, dark night of sin is almost passed; the morn will break in glory by and-by. Our Redeemer liveth! He has opened up a way of life to us, and we are almost in sight of our Father's house. Soon the vail will be removed, and his glory will fill the earth as the waters do the sea; then we shall see those loved ones that are sleeping in the cold grave, and gaze into eyes that tears no more will dim. Then we shall see Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of God. Bless God for the hope of the gospel. I expect to be saved by grace. Once I trampled upon this holy covenant and took his name in vain; but, brethren, I have learned to trust in Jesus, and when the bright morning dawns I expect he will speak my worthless name: "Come home." Blessed home, free from sorrow, pain and death.

From Geo. W. Miller, Anoka, Minn.

I am now at this place, holding a tent meeting. Br. L. F. Cole, of Oneida, Ills., is with me, preaching the word. We have had good, attentive audiences from the first, who continue to come every evening, manifesting a strong desire to know the reasons of our faith and hope. Our congregations are made up of some of the most reliable members of the different denominations in the place. But one minister has attended our meeting, and that was a Universalist, who spoke words of comfort to us and in a more substantial way rendered us aid in defraying expenses. Some have already remarked, that our meetings will be the means of stirring up the ministers to preach more Bible in their discourses, and the people to read the Bible more carefully, and with more interest.

Our tent meeting held at Montevideo, in Chippewa county, Minn., which commenced July 3 and held over two Sundays, was a success. A church of six members was organized of living, working Christians. Four of them were baptized by immersion; all heads of families. There were others whose sympathies were with them, that will, as soon as convenient, unite with the church. We left them full of good cheer and courage, fully determined to keep the standard of truth raised upon the frontier of our State.

Br. L. R. Wood, formerly of Smith Lake, has consented to labor in this region, and to keep the truth of the soon-coming kingdom before the people. May the Lord bless him in his labors, and the brethren stay up his hands in a good substantial mannner.

From C. R. White.

BR. SHELDON.—How is Isa. 65:17 (latter clause) to be reconciled with all those numerous passages of Scriptures, which seem to teach that there will at least be some remembrance of former things as regards this earth?

"The Four Kingdoms and the Fifth," by Henry Dana Ward, Philadelphia, Pa. I greatly esteem the writings of H. D. W., but I think he draws a wrong inference when he infers that the Thessalonians were induced to believe Christ had already come and they were left behind, from what Paul had written in the First Epistle to them concerning the second coming of Christ. No one, I think, could infer from that epistle that Christ had already come, or was even at hand, as our authorized version falsely teaches; but in 2 Tim. 2:18, Paul tells of some having taught that the resurrection was past, and thus overthrew the faith of some; and, of course, the second coming of Christ being immediately connected with the resurrection, that report or a similar one, no doubt, was the the cause of the error of the Thessalonians.

All those who quote or refer to those Scriptures which teach that Christ will reign over the nations of earth, and all kings shall fall down and worship him, etc., should not omit to give the Scripture definition of the nations and kings he will reign over, as it is one of the refutations of the age-to-come theory, a future probation, etc. The definitions are found in Rev. 5:9, 10, and 21:24, etc.

The redeemed are called a nation; and also nations as being taken out of every kindred tribe and tongue, the preaching of the gospel was designed (only) to take out of the nations a people for the Lord, as to they are the families that are to be blessed with Abraham.

It is said, "The wise shall understand," but what wise? Not the wise of this world.

[NOTE.—Isaiah foresaw that the future glory would so eclipse the past scenes of earth that they would not be remembered with a desire for their return, or should not "come upon the heart," as the margin reads. We see no conflict when we get the thought that was in the prophet's mind. When it is said that God will "remember our sins no more," it does not mean that he will have no power to recollect the past. "Remember" is used in more than one sense.—ED.]

From J. C. Smith, Kansas.

The "Word of the Kingdom" is still being sounded out here in Kansas. Our mission tent was pitched at this place, Melvern, Osage county, Kansas, August 7th, and from that date a blessed work has been going on. Thus far we have had one of the richest and best meetings that I ever enjoyed. The sweet influence of the Holy Spirit rests upon the preachers and people. Many hearts are becoming tender. Sectarianism, with all its shame, gives way before the melting spirit of God. Infidelity and Spiritualism, attended with its bigotry and deceptiveness, is giving way before the power of truth, which is doing its office work. It is sharp and powerful; mighty through God to the pulling down of the strongholds of Satan. Spiritual wickedness in high places is laid open before the eyes of the blind, and they see where they have been drifting. Theology of the day, with all of its deformity, such as "never dying soul to save," "go to heaven, or hell at death," "all immortal," "judged at death and then at the appearing of Christ, brought back and judged over, cast back into hell to suffer, not the penalty of the law—"death," —but "eternal life in misery," is being exposed to the world. Shame, shame, to such a theory. May the holders of it see their error and remove the libel on God's character; see that he is a God of love and mercy, not willing that any should perish—but that all should come to repentance and live. The people are stirred up here wonderfully on the great plan of salvation. Br. Wellcome's work is doing much good. He has sent me some $6.00 worth of tracts, for which I am thankful, and they are doing good. Our meeting, yesterday, was one long to be remembered. A goodly number came the distance of ten miles. Saturday evening and Sunday forenoon a Methodist preacher was with us, to help in the meetings. Saturday evening we had liberty in speaking before him of the personal, literal coming of the Son of Man. Scripture after Scripture was given from the spirit of prophecy, showing that it would be the same Jesus, having flesh and bones, and that he would come to save his people. The truth of his second coming does away with all the comings of false teachers and Christs. He has proved himself to be the true Christ by many mighty works. He has gone away, and will truly come again in power and glory, with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all. And having this hope we purify ourselves even as he is pure. Such a hope stimulates, encourages, makes strong and gives rejoicing, such as the world cannot give nor take away. "And every man that hath this hope." "Blessed hope." "Looking for the blessed hope" and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who will change these vile bodies and fashion them like his glorious body, to die no more. Well these things stir the people, and all praise be to the Lord. The tracts sent to us are doing good. When people become interested they want to read. O that those that have the means would send in to the Publishing Society, that millions of copies might be printed and sent forth into this and other destitute fields. The company in attendance yesterday was large and attentive. In the afternoon Br. Bliss spoke of man in death, giving the law and its penalty, and left man in the grave. In the evening we endeavored to show how man was placed on a new trial for life; and that Christ had become the way, the truth, and the life. And that this life we live by faith on the Son of God; when dead, our life is hid with Christ in God; that when he who is our life should appear, then we should appear with him in glory. And that Christ was the resurrection and the life. "I am he that was dead and am alive, and alive forever more, and have the keys of death and hell." Then when he comes the keys will be applied, and the prison houses of death will be unlocked. Then will the language of the prophet be fulfilled in speaking of the whole house of Israel, or God's people, wherever they are. They shall hear the voice of the Son of God and come forth, bone to his bone. Sinews and flesh came upon them, skin covered them over, breath was breathed into them and they did live, and stood upon their feet an exceeding great army. "Then he said unto me, Son of Man these bones are the whole house of Israel. Behold, they say, our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts. Therefore prophesy and say unto them: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves. And shall put my spirit into you, and ye shall live and I shall place you in your own land. Then shall ye know that I, the Lord, hath spoken it and performed it, saith the Lord." Pray for us, dear brethren and sisters, that we may have strength and ability to give these precious truths to all, in meekness and fear, and may those that have books, tracts, papers, etc., that are laying idle, send them to this western field, where thousands are perishing for want of the bread of life. O that all would awake and let the glory of the Lord shine upon them, and work while the day lasts. Brethren and sisters, let us throw self and self interests away, and have the cause of Christ first in all that we do. What is done must be done quickly. The harvest is nearly ripe. O that other laborers would come forth in the might and power of God, leaving all for Christ. And those that have the means ought to give as to the Lord, and not "muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." Come, brethren, we have a few laborers that are willing to leave all—home and loved ones, comforts, enjoyment, ease—and go forth without scrip or purse, from place to place; sometimes walk twenty-five and thirty miles a day, live on crackers and water, sleep under the broad canopy of heaven by night; and, often by day, resting with the full blaze of the sun streaming upon them, without any shade on these broad prairies. Yes, brethren, we have such here, and they need an encouraging word, among strangers in a strange land. You that have enough and to spare, can you not, and will you not lend to Jesus? Ask him about these things, and then do his will. From your brother, in the work of Christ.

From Ruth M. Rowell, Kittery, Maine.

To the brethren and sisters scattered abroad to whom I have preached the word of life greeting:

In regard to my health and what I am doing, coming to me from different quarters, to all of which I cannot reply personally, as well as in compliance with the earnest request of dear ones in my field of labor in Winona Co., Minn., that they might occasionally during my absence in New England, see something from my pen in THE TIMES, I note down a few things this afternoon for our precious western advent paper.

Unremitting and arduous labors in the vineyard of the Lord coupled with constant and manifold domestic cares and duties so affected my health that on the 1st of July, 1872, I was under the necessity of recalling all my appointments and resting for a season. From that time until the following spring I did not deliver a discourse except on funeral occasions but through all of those months I had a most blessed peace and quiet resting in Jesus.

This spring in compliance with urgent request I took a trip to Wisconsin of a few weeks, preaching in Buffalo and Eau Clair counties. My last Sunday being at Brunswick where, at Br. Churchill's, I took the boat down the Chippeway, which I followed to its mouth and proceeded home. The Lord has faithful children through that section, many of whom spoke to me most earnestly of the faithful and effectual labors of Eld. G. W. Turner, who had proved himself a worthy servant of the Lord, "rightly dividing the word of truth" and giving to each a portion in due season.

At the opening up of the warm weather of this summer it was decided that my health demanded a change of air and scene and that a visit to the seaside would be most beneficial. But I could not leave without preaching to these dear people with whom I had enjoyed so many precious seasons. Our final meeting at Martin's Ridge, was a blessed one. At the close of the discourse twenty gave testimony for the Lord, as also many others would have done but time admonished us that we must close. Our last Sunday was in Utica. We preached from the stand in Br. Cheatham's grove. We had a good congregation and a deep interest. Four ordained preachers were to assist us; one Adventist and three Free-Will Baptist, one of whom was our beloved Sr. Cobb, who abounds in good works.

In the afternoon we preached at the Vowels school house to our beloved English friends. The house was packed with people, and those who could not find standing room inside the door gathered upon the outside, while we spoke to them out of God's Word. After the discourse our hearts rejoiced and were made glad in the Lord by the numerous and decided testimonies for Jesus, at the close of which the congregation rose in one mass to testify their desires to so lay hold of Christ and shape their life that all might be Christ's at his coming when we mingled our voices in that beautiful melody:

"In the sweet bye and bye,
We shall meet on that beautiful shore."

I arranged in my mind to visit the brethren in Burns and West Salem before my departure as well as partially promised to give a Sunday to the church in Sparta, but upon my return from Utica, I was so poorly that my husband objected and I was obliged to relinquish the idea, which however was quite a trial to me. Accordingly passed through Wis. to Chicago, without meeting any of them except Dr. Stanley and wife of Wis., whom we met and had a pleasant interview in the car. On our way into Chicago in the early morning we passed through Norwood Park, where our western printing office is located, and felt something of those deep emotions that thrill the hearts of our Adventist brethren and sisters when they think of the great work that office has done and is doing.

Stopped in Rochester, N. Y. over the first Sunday from Minn., at the house of Br. & Sr. McCulloch, where I made the acquaintance of Eld. Whitmore: found him a much younger man than I expected, as also more genial. He is of pleasant address and an able speaker, but hope he will not write any more Essays on Woman unless he takes the other side of the question, which we trust he will when he has given it more thought. When we said good bye we could but lift an inward prayer that our Heavenly Father would bless in his ministry. "I write to you young men that are strong," said Paul Would that we had scores of such in our ranks united in heart and effort, what a war they might wage against sin.

I was grieved to hear of the sickness of Sr. Stoddard, as also the failing health of Sr. Jennings—was sorry I could not have met with them as I passed through. Ah, it is a hard thing to be a woman preacher. God only knows what they have to suffer and endure and how often those who ought to obey the injunction of St. Paul, "Help those women who labor with us in the Gospel," instead of helping quietly put hindrances and trials in their way thereby not only wounding their feelings but hurting the cause of Christ. God bless those noble hearted men, true servants of Christ, that care for all his laborers like their Master having "no respect of person," to all such will he say when he comes, "inasmuch as ye have done it to the very least of these my little ones ye have done it unto me."

From Rochester went to Our Home on the Hillside, at Dansville, which has become a place of fashionable resort as well as a home for invalids. Here the Oracle Dr. Jackson informed me very decidedly that I must let preaching and writing and thinking alone and just rest, rest, rest.

On my arrival at concord heard that celebrated man, Eld. G. W. Storrs give two discourses. He is an able and efficient speaker. Also listened with great pleasure to Eld. H. L. Hastings, in the Bethel chapel, on the following Sunday. What gave me greatest satisfaction was the intense desire that seemed to pervade everything he said to meet the exact wants and spiritual needs of his audience. Nothing for effect but every word tending to wean the people from distractions and side issues, and invite them to liberty of heart, unity of effort, and holiness of life. When he spoke so earnestly and ably on giving thanks at table and family prayer, I did feel very much like crying out some long and loud Amens.

In this city met for the first time Sr. Sargeant formerly Editor of Woman and her Work. She is a woman of culture who finds a place in your heart at once. By invitation dined at her home and passed some very pleasant hours in her family. Her husband Eld. Sargeant had recently returned from an appointment in Mass. and impressed me at once with a sense of his kindness, sincerity and love of truth.

Through many years I had longed and hoped and waited to meet that dear woman who has labored so faithfully in the cellars and garrets, whom we call Annie Smith. That desire has been gratified. I have seen her, heard her preach in this same Bethel chapel, yes, looked right into those earnest eyes of hers, watched the play of that pleasant smile upon her mouth and taken her precious hand in my own. God bless her. Pleasant were the hours I passed in the society of Srs. Sargeant and Smith, very pleasant and precious to me. Such meetings and communings are like oasis in the desert of life where the weary pilgrim rests and is refreshed. "Our Heavenly Father knoweth that we have need of them."

Aug. 10.—Preached in Allentown meeting house in the forenoon and at 1 o'clock p. m. Also at 5 o'clock p. m. in the Christian meeting house in Epsom. It was a good day in the Lord. Came from there to Kittery, where I am happy with my youngest sister's presence. She is pastor of a church in this place, and has just received documents from the governor and council of the State of Maine authorizing her to solemnize marriages.—This act of the governor and council makes it a settled fact that it is legal for one woman at least to marry in Maine. Let others in authority go and do likewise.

It seems pleasant to see and hear of so many Adventists—brethren, sisters and preachers—all around me, and while I see such a redundancy of preachers, I think of the great western fields, all white and ready for harvest, but ah, how few laborers. God bless and strengthen the faithful ones who, in those western fields, labor and work and struggle for the right. Should I ever again labor with them—Father only knows. I feel strong in the Lord, and wherever I go, as strength permits, expect to go preaching the word and working for Jesus. Pray for me.

A Minister has Fallen.

A minister of the gospel has fallen. He was a man who stood high in the church. He had preached the gospel for many years. He was everywhere respected and esteemed. He was cited as an example of every virtue. He was an earnest preacher. He denounced sin in strong terms. He urged with great power the practice of holy living. He has occupied the pulpit in several prominent churches. He was very respectably connected. He was known in Europe and America.

But he fell. He was tempted. He yielded to temptation. He committed crime. His sin is too shameful to write.

From the greatest height he has gone to the lowest depth. He has put a dark blot upon his name. He has disgraced his profession. He has inflicted upon the church an injury which he can never repair. He has broken the hearts of his family. He has done irreparable harm to souls. He has encouraged the enemies of Christianity to blaspheme. He has wounded the heart of Jesus. He has probably ruined his own soul forever.

How mournful a case! Who does not grieve over so sad a fall? May God have mercy on his soul! May he graciously save the church from the scandal he has inflicted upon it! May all others who think they stand, take heed lest they fall!—Lutheran Missionary.

The Silver Handwriting.

After the coming of Christ and the writing of the New Testament, the scribes (as those were called who copied books) admired the Christian sacred book so much, that they thought no amount of time spent in copying anything so grand could be wasted; and they toiled year after year, sometimes a whole life long, on a single copy of the Scriptures. Some of these copies were wonderfully beautiful. They had strange, bright letters, in different colors, and curious pictures, the like of which no man had ever seen; for each scribe used his own fancy, and invented whatever adornment pleased him.

Some of these manuscripts are yet in existence. There is one at a place called Upsala, in Sweden, which is called "The Silver Handwriting." It was written thirteen hundred years ago, but was lost, or hidden away, for seven hundred years. Then some one found it; and, after it had changed hands a good many times, the Chancellor of Sweden bought it for £80, and had it bound in solid silver; after which he gave it to the University of Upsala.

It is written on crimson parchment. All its letters are of the color of silver, except the heading of the pages and chapters, and a few verses which were thought by the writer to be the most wonderful; these were written in gold.

All along the edges of this beautiful Bible, and on the title-pages of the different books, are strange pictures in silver and gold.

No wonder it was thought worthy of being bound in silver, and kept as a great treasure which money could not buy. Our book-makers think they can make us very pretty books; and we often see them bound in velvet, and adorned with golden corners, but all this work is done by machinery, and is not, after all, half so beautiful as this "Silver Handwriting," done by one man who loved the Bible, and wanted to make others love it.—Bright Side.

Both Needed.

We should study the New Testament Scriptures, and neglect not the Old, for it was of the Old the Saviour spoke when he said, "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." It was of them Paul spake, when exhorting Timothy to continue in the things which he had learned, adding, "from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation." It was of them he spoke when, in the same connection, he declared, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

"Let them, therefore, dwell in us richly in wisdom." Take away the Old Testament, and even though the Christianity of the New were left, there would be an immense want in meeting the different moods of feeling and stages of thought in human nature. The deep sense of sin inwrought by the ceremonial of purification has its value to many minds, apart from the light it casts on the doctrine of atonement; and the fiery denunciations of the prophets will be needed till the millennium. There is an energetic patriotism and a strong national life which the gospel comes to broaden and enlighten, but not to destroy. There is the tender and pathetic, in view of man's frailty and of the nothingness of his earthly life, musings on the dim future in Job and some of the Psalms, such as float in on the soul only in the twilight and with the sound of evening bells. The New Testament is more cheerful, and filled with bright sunshine, but the other has its time and truth to many hearts—to all hearts at certain hours. The evening and morning are still needed, as at first, to make the full day.—Sel.

The Goodly Stones of the Temple.

One day, near the close of our Savior's ministry, as he was about leaving the great Temple in Jerusalem, his attention was arrested by the exclamation of one of his disciples, "Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here!" The "goodly stones and gifts" connected with that sacred edifice astonished them and they thought they would the Master. Mark xiii. 1,2; Luke xxi. 5, 6. Of its stones Josephus says, "Some of them were forty-five cubits in length, five in height, and six in breadth," which would be, at least, sixty-seven feet long, seven feet high, and nine feet broad; others of them, he says elsewhere, were "twenty-five cubits long, eight high and about twelve broad," or nearly thirty-eight feet in length, twelve in height and eighteen in breadth. These statements might seem to us incredible, were it not for the testimony of travelers, that stones of similar dimensions are found at this day in ruined temples of the East. At Baalbec, for instance, we are told there are "three blocks forming an upper course twenty feet from the ground, which together measure 190 feet, being severally of the enormous dimensions of sixty-three and sixty-four feet in length, by twelve in breadth and thickness," while the journal of the "returned missionary" speaks of one hewn out of the quarry, but not carried away, which is of still larger dimensions.

Sin can bring down the highest and strongest house. The "holy and beautiful" temple of Solomon was burned and overthrown by the enemy, while that of Zerubabel and Herod shared a similar fate. Human glory, however bright must fade like gathered flowers; but the "lively stones" of God's spiritual house" are destined to last forever in beauty immortal. If men know not how to move such immense blocks of stone as are found in the ruins of Baalbec, God knows how and when to move from the quarries of earth to his heavenly kingdom the prepared stones of his "holy temple" (Eph. ii. 17-22). And he will do it. Compare 1 Thess. iv 16, 17, with Matt. xxiv. 31.—Advent Herald.

The Stubborn Boot.

"Bother!" was all John Clatterby said,
His breath came quick and his cheek was red
He flourished his elbows and looked absurd,
While over and over his "Bother!" I heard.

Harder and harder the fellow worked,
Vainly and savagely still he jerked;
The boot, half on, would dangle and flap,
"Bother!" and then he bursted the strap.

Redder than ever his hot cheek flamed,
Harder than ever he fumed and blamed:
He wriggled his heel and tugged at the leather
Till knees and chin came bumping together.

"My boy," said I, in a voice like a flute,
"Why not—ahem!—try the mate of that boot;
Or the other foot?"—"I'm a goose," laughed John,
As he stood, in a flash, with two boots on.

In half the affairs
Of this busy life
(As that same day
I said to my wife)
Our troubles come
From trying to put
The left hand shoe
On the right hand foot.
Or vice versa.
(Meaning reverse, sir),
To try to force,
As quite of course,
Any wrong foot
In the right shoe
Is the silliest thing
A man can do.

Love Wins Love.

"Mother, the birdies all love father," said a little boy of five years, as he stood with his mother watching the robins enjoying their morning meal of cherries from the old tree that overhung the house.

"Does anybody else love father, Charlie?"

"O, yes I love him, and you love him; but we know more than the birds."

"What do you think is the reason the birdies love your father?"

Charlie did not seem to hear this question. He was absorbed in deep thought.

"Mother" at last he said, all the creatures love father. My dog is almost as glad to see him as he is me. Pussy, you know, always comes to him, and seems to know exactly what he is saying. Even the old cow follows him all over the meadow, and the other day I saw her licking his hand just as a dog would. I think it is because father loves them, mother. You know he will often get up and give pussy something to eat; and he pulls carrots for the cow, and pats her, and talks to her; and somehow I think his voice never sounds so pleasant as when he talks to the creatures."

"I think his voice sounds pleasant when he is talking to his little boy."

Charlie smiled.

"Father loves me," he said, "and I love him dearly. He loves the birds, too, I am sure. He whistles to them every morning when they are eating cherries, and they are not a bit afraid of him, though he is almost near enough to catch them. Mother, I wish everything loved me as well as they do father."

"Do as father does, Charlie, and they will. Love all living things, and be kind to them. Do not speak roughly to the dog. Don't pull pussy's tail, nor chase the hens, nor try to frighten the cow. Never hurt or tease anything. Speak gently and lovingly to them. Feed them and seek their comfort, and they will love you, and everybody that knows you will love you, too."—British Workman.

A Scar on the Soul.

One of my most pleasant memories of early Sabbath school days is of a lad who for a short time was my pupil. My acquaintance with him began thus:

Being in the country for the summer, the first Sunday of my stay I went to a different church from that attended by the family with whom I sojourned. We came from a distance and in the same carriage. Knowing it was communion at the church which my friend attended, to save them trouble of calling for me after the morning service I walked to the place where the horse and wagon were fastened under an elm-tree behind the church, intending to sit there until they should join me. Only two other vehicles were there, in one of which sat a boy whom I observed to be assiduously driving off flies from the horse, saying as he did so, "Poor Ned! poor Ned! next Sunday we'll have a new net. Pa won't forget to buy one this week, 'cause I'll help him remember." His back was toward me, so he was unaware of my presence; but his kind words and acts so attracted me that I resolved upon farther acquaintance. I walked back and forth a few times before taking my seat in the wagon, and soon had opportunity to observe the pleasing face and gentlemanly bearing of the little fellow. Presently I said,—

"Your horse has a kind little master, I perceive."

"That's because father and mother think so much of Ned," replied the boy, modestly. "Besides, I don't like to have him so tormented by the flies. You see he has stood it all the time I was at church, and now I have come to help him."

"Then you were at church during the first service?"

"O, yes, ma'am, and I went to Sunday school at nine o'clock."

"I should think you would be tired being confined so long. Why not run about a little? Wouldn't you like to?

"Yes, ma'am; but then poor Ned would be so pestered. I'd rather stay."

"Then your father and mother did not bid you to?"

"No ma'am; but somehow I'd feel better to do so."

Kind little fellow! I said to myself; and then asked,

"What are you going to do this afternoon?"

"I'm going to read to blind Samuel."

"That will keep you confined, too."

"Yes, but I'll have my dinner first, and a little time to run about in the orchard, too," he replied.

"Suppose you let me go in your place?"

"O, but I promised," said the boy, quickly, and looking up earnestly.

"I could excuse you in some way."

"Please ma'am I don't see how, because I'm not sick."

"But why be so particular, as long as Samuel is not neglected?"

"I can't explain it very well, ma'am, replied the boy, looking a little troubled, —perhaps feeling disappointed in his new friend, who seemed apparently desirous to lead him astray,—"I can't explain it but it wouldn't be me reading to him. Besides, he would be disappointed not to see me; but that wouldn't be the worst of it."

"What would be the worst of it?"

"Well ma'am, as you ask me, I will tell you what my father and mother taught me,—that to break my promise, even in a small thing, is a sin, and every sin leaves a scar upon the soul."

I now commended the little fellow warmly, and told him that my questions were merely to enable me to become better acquainted with him.

"O, I am so glad!" said the child, with a breath of relief; because I was beginning to like you."

"And could you not have liked me otherwise?"

"No ma'am; not if you wished me to do wrong," replied the child, candidly.

Noble boy! his nice sense of right and honor increased with his years. He lived to become a fine and high principled young man, possessing a remarkable influence over others for good; his quiet example, and firm but unostentatious adherence to what was good and right giving weight to his words. He died early, but lived long enough to make his mark on many souls, some of whom became converted through his instrumentality.

How true the word about the "scar on the soul!" Yes, every sin, even though subsequently repented of, leaves a disfiguring mark, as unsightly to the eye of God as a scar upon the face would appear to us.—S. S. Times.

Obituary.

BUTLER.—In Guilford, Conn., July 17, 1873, Br. Levi Butler. Aged, 53 years.

He fell from the roof of his house, while in the act of picking cherries from a limb which hung over the roof. He lived but a few hours after his fall. He was loved by all who knew him. He loved the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of Jesus. He leaves a wife and six children. May the God of all grace and comfort be their help and strength.

Funeral services by the writer. B. HITCHCOCK.

WEAVER.—Died, at Buchanan, Mich., Aug. 2, 1873, Cam, daughter of Br. and Sr. P. M. and D. Weaver, in the 27th year of her age.

Sister Cam bore her long confinement with Christian fortitude. Her hope and trust was in God, and she now sleeps in Jesus.

Br. and Sr. Weaver mourn for a dutiful daughter but not as those without hope.

A brother and three sisters feel deeply their loss. Cam was an affectionate sister, ever ready to cheer and comfort them.

The church mourns the loss of one of its purest members. The Sunday school for one of its earnest teachers. Sister C. was ever ready to work for the cause of her Master. Now she is at rest, waiting the Master's call: "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom." D. MATHEWSON.

ALICE E. RATHBUN.

The Northern Illinois A. C. Conference will hold its annual session during the camp meeting at Wyanet. It is hoped that each church within the bounds of this Conference will send either by delegate, or by letter, a full report of the past year. Each minister is expected to be present in person or else report by letter.

Come, brethren in the ministry and laity, let us make a united and earnest effort to proclaim to a judgment-bound world the good news of our soon-coming King.

Any letters for the Conference should be addressed to the Secretary, Wyanet, Bureau county, Illinois. N. W. SPENCER, President.
C. C. MARSTON, Secretary.

The camp meeting of the Northern Illinois Conference will be held at Wyanet, Bureau county, commencing August 30, and continuing over two Sabbaths.

Wyanet is on the C. B. and Q. R. R.; west from Mendota. Those coming on the I. C. R. R., will change cars at Mendota. Those coming on the C. and R. I. R. R., will change at Burlington Crossing.

The camp ground is a half a mile east from the depot.

It is earnestly hoped that each church will be represented in the tented grove at Wyanet this year. Lumber will be furnished on the ground for making tents, at cost if destroyed, and free if uninjured. Let there be a general rally from all parts of the conference, and we should rejoice to see tents on the ground from any of our sister conferences. Come one, come all, laymen and ministers, brother and sister, saint and sinner, from this or any other conference. Come praying, come in the spirit of Elijah's God, and come to labor for the salvation of perishing sinners. We hope to see the best camp meeting this year ever held in the State. So mote it be.

A cordial invitation is hereby extended to any minister from abroad who may be desirous of attending the meeting. There will be a hearty welcome accorded to all who come in the spirit of the Master to labor for his glory.

For those who may wish to board on the ground ample provision will be made.

In behalf of Committee,
N. W. SPENCER, Chairman.
C. C. MARSTON, Secretary.

Preaching brethren coming to Chicago wishing to preach in Advent Christian Chapel, will correspond with H. P. WRIGHT, 203 Walnut Street.

I expect to be at the Iowa camp meeting, Sept. 10-14. C. C. MARSTON.

Preaching in Chicago every Sunday, as follows: South Side, 216 Shirtliff avenue, at 10.30 a. m.
North Side, Lincoln Park, at 3 p. m.
Mission Hall, 619 West Lake street, at 7:30 p.m.
Prayer meeting in Mission Hall, Thursday evenings. P. O. Address, 619 West Lake street.
D. R. and M. S. MANSFIELD.

I see in the notice of camp-meeting, a direction for "those coming on the C. & Rock Island R. R. to change at the Burlington crossing," which is wrong, as the R. I. R. R. time is behind the Burlington R. R. time, and it's an all-day waiting; but say: Those coming on the Rock Island R. R. should stop at Pond Creek, where they will find teams that will take them to the camp-ground, which is 1½ miles distant. There is quite an interest about here, in view of the meeting, and may the Lord meet with us to bless.
Your friend, H. N. BLISS.

The fourth annual session of the A. C. Conference will commence on Thurday, the 11th of Sept. in the forenoon, in connection with the camp meeting at Manchester, Delaware county, commencing September 5, and to continue over the 14th. More particulars hereafter. Let all get ready to come. H. H. JANES.

The annual camp meeting of the Iowa A. C. Conference will be held at Manchester, Delaware county, commencing Sept. 5, and continuing over two Sundays. The camp ground is situated one mile north of the depot, on the same ground as last year. We expect a large and good meeting. Come, brethren and sisters, from east, west, north and south, to this annual feast of tabernacles; come with hearts filled with love to God and man, to labor for the salvation of the perishing; come to get good and to do good. Let there be a generally rally of the lovers of truth (without regard to name or denomination) to this meeting. Let all bring a plenty of bedding; and, all that can, bring tents. Sheeting enough for a family tent will cost but a little, and then the cloth will be as good to make up as before. Straw and hay, for horses, will be provided free. Oats and corn will be furnished cheap. A small victualing stand will be on the ground, and bread, etc., can be got at the bakery; but do not depend upon these—bring your provisions if possible. There will be no boarding tent. Efficient help is expected from abroad to preach the Word.
For the Committee,
J. RIDLEY,
D. K. LEWIS.

There will be a meeting in the Iowa Mission Tent, at Waltham, Tama county, to commence Sept. 5, and continue over the second Lord's day. All are invited.

Also, the Iowa Mission Tent will be pitched Sept. 17th near Dysert, Tama county, in Clark township, and continue over the first Lord's day.
PETER S. W. DETO.

The Northwestern Missouri and Southwestern Iowa Conference will be held at Grice's Grove, Noble township, Cass county, 2 miles north of Millford, Montgomery county, commencing Sept. 4 and continuing over one Sabbath. It is earnestly hoped that each church will be represented; and, those having tents, bring them. Feed for horse, and straw for bedding will be furnished. We feel the need of an evangelist, and hope some brother will come and engage with us for the ensuing year. A cordial invitation is hereby given to any minister from abroad, who may be desirous of attending the meeting. A cordial welcome will be extended to all who come in the spirit of the Master to labor for the glory of our soon coming King. J. A. ROMIG.

Will begin Friday, Aug. 29, at 11 o'clock, and hold over the following Lord's day. We hope to see all the lovers of truth in that region at the meeting. Come one and all. S. K. GIBSON.

The fourth annual session of the A. C. C. will commence on Thursday, Sept. 11, 9 a. m. To be holden in connection with the camp meeting held at Machester, Ia., commencing Sept. 5 and holding over two Sabbaths. Ministers will remember that the constitution requires them to report themselves either by their presence or by letter, and each church will see that they are properly represented by delegates who shall have "his credentials with him." Each church is entitled to one delegate for every 15 members, or fraction thereof. Business of vital importance will come before this meeting—business that we, as churches and individuals, are interested and concerned in. Let there be a rally then in the name of Israel's God, of both ministers and brethren; yes, and sisters and children. Come yourselves and bring your neighbors; come to work for God and the salvation of sinners; come sanctify a fast to the Lord, and see if he will not pour you out a blessing. Let no small excuse deter you from this feast of tabernacles; come praying in the Holy Ghost that God will bless with the outpouring of his Spirit, that souls may be converted and saints rejoice. Bring tents if possible.

The Magical Isle in the River of Time.

BY MARY E. BACHELER.

There's a magical isle in the river of time,
Where softest of echoes are straying,
And the isle is as sweet as a musical chime,
Or the exquisite breath of a tropical clime
When June with the roses is staying.

'Tis there memory dwells, with her golden hue,
And music forever is flowing,
While the low musical tones that come tremblingly through,
Sadly trouble the heart, and yet sweeten it too,
As south winds o'er waters are blowing.

There are shadowy hills in the fairy-like isle,
Where pictures of beauty are gleaming;
Yet the light of their eyes, and their sweet, sunny smile
Only flash round the heart with a 'wildering wile,
And leave us to know 'tis but dreaming.

And the name of this isle is the beautiful past,
And we bury our treasures all there;
There are beings of beauty, too lovely to last;
There are bosoms of snow, with dust o'er them cast;
There are tresses and ringlets of hair;

There are fragments of songs only memory sings,
And the word of a dear mother's prayer;
There's a harp long unswept, and a lute without strings;
There are flowers all withered, and letters, and rings—
Hallowed tokens that love used to wear.

E'en the dead, the bright, beautiful dead there arise,
With their soft-flowing ringlets of gold;
Though their voices are hushed, and o'er their sweet eyes
The unbroken signet of silence now lies,
They are with us again as of old.

In the stillness of night hands are beckoning us there,
And with joy that is almost a pain,
We delight to turn back, and in wandering there,
Through the shadowy halls of this island so fair,
We behold our lost treasure again.

O, this beautiful isle, with its phantom-like show,
Is a vista unfadingly bright;
And the river of time in its turbulent flow,
Is oft soothed by the voices we heard long ago,
When the years were a dream of delight.

Destruction of the Globe.

When our blessed Lord comes, all creation will be purified and reconstructed. Some think that this earth has become so vile that the sooner it is extinguished the better. They think that it is unworthy of God to retain an orb so poor and so sin-stained, and that it had better be cancelled and a lovelier one placed in its orbit. There is no prediction of such a catastrophe in the Bible. deeper we penetrate the areana of nature, the clearer is the proof that annihilation is not possible, and certainly is not a fact. But apart from this, would it not be a grievous loss were a world of so historic antecedents as ours expunged from its orbit, and dismissed over the depths of oblivion forever? What! shall the atmosphere breathed by the incarnate God cease to exist? Shall the flowers that those eyes looked on, and the sweet sounds of brooks, and waves, and winds, those ears heard, be all extinguished for ever? Shall the Mount of Olives, from which He rose; the Mount Tabor, on which a transient gleam of his glory rested, be thrown down? Shall Calvary and Gethsemane be only names of things that no longer are? I cannot believe it; all the instincts of my nature revolt against the idea, and the instinctive desires in our hearts to perpetuate those historic scenes of the past, are ripples from the great tides of eternity, and in their measure they tell us God will not destroy scenes that superstition may in this imperfect economy prevent, which Christians treat only as they desire when they reverently remember them. To destroy the earth would be to acknowledge and seal the success of Satan. He has no right or claim to the possession of it. Such a result would interrupt or reverse the great process that God has constantly pursued, and end the analogy that runs through all inspiration. The great law in revelation is not to destroy, and create other things instead, but to take old things and purify and restore them, so as to make them what they were or should be. All the Saviour's miracles are indications of this. When He opened the eyes of the blind, He did not take out the old orbs, and put in new ones, but he renewed the old ones. And when He unstopped the ears of the deaf, and laid the fever of the sick, or made the lame leap as the roe, or when He quickened the dead—these, and indeed all His miracles, were restorative and beneficent, as well as miraculous and divine. And therefore we believe the earth will not be destroped. Indeed, Scripture expressly promises "a new heaven and a new earth." St. John does not say, "I saw another heaven and another earth," as he would have said if it had been something substituted for the old. But does not "new" mean "another"? Certainly not. For instance, we read, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." Does not that mean that his identity disappears, and that he becomes another man? Not at all; he is changed, regenerated, transformed, and becomes new only in the noblest and intensest sense of that word. So this earth will be made a new earth; it will be disinfected and purified; the last fire will refine it as gold and silver; and Jesus, the Great High Priest, will wave His priestly hand over it, and on that earth which has shared in our descent and has become corrupt, literally, I believe not figuratively, its deserts will rejoice, its solitary places will blossom like the rose, the lion shall lie down with the lamb, and a little child shall lead them. These are not stray fancies, but assured facts and prophecies that must be accomplished. God has so written it in His holy word, and He will so arrange it in his providence.—DR. CUMMING, in The Last Warning Cry.

The Changed Body.

BY THE REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE.

"For our citizenship is in heaven; from whence we also look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who will transform the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed in the body of his glory, according to the working with which he is able also to subject all things to himself."—Phil. 3; 20, 21. Bible Union Trans

But how will these bodies look? The bodies of the righteous, in the first place, will be RIGHTEOUS. The most perfectly formed body, indeeq, is a mere skeleton to what it would, have been had not sin come. God's modle of a face, of a hand, of a foot, of a body, we know not. If, after an exquisite statue has been finished, you should take a chisel and clip it, and clip it, and [illegible] ue in an out-of-doors e[illegible] beauty would nearly all be g[illegible] the human body has been crippled, and blasted, and battered a thousand years. Physical defects have been handed down from generation to generation for six thousand years; and we have inherited all the infelicities of the past. But when God takes the righteous out of their graves, he will refashion, and improve, and adorn according to the original model, until the difference between a gymnast and the emaciated wretch in the lazaretto is not so great as that between our present bodily structures and our gloriously resurrected forms. There you will see the perfected eye, out of which, by the waters of death, has been washed the last trace of tears and study. Then you will see the perfected hand—the knots on the knuckles of toil untied. No more stoop of the shoulders from burden-bearing and weight of years. But all of us erect, elastic—the life of God in all the frame. The most striking and impressive thing on earth now is the human face. Yet it is vailed in the black vail, of a thousand griefs. But when God, on the Resurrection morn, shall pull aside the vail, I suppose that the face of the sun in the sky is dull and stupid compared with the outflaming glories of the countenances of the saved. I suppose that when those faces shall turn to look toward the gate or up toward the Throne, it will be like the dawn of a new morning on the bosom of everlasting day.

The body will be IMMORTAL. The physical system is perpetually wasting away. It is only because we keep putting in the fuel that the furnace does not go entirely out. Blood-vessels are only canals to carry breadstuffs to the different parts. If these supplies fail, we die. Sickness and death lurk around to see if they cannot get a pry under the tenement; and at a slight push we tumble off the embankment of the grave. But the righteous, arisen, shall have an immortal body. It will be incapable of disease. You will hear no cough or groan. There will be no miasma or fever in the air. There will be no rough steep down which to fall, no fracturing a limb. People cross the sea for their health; but that voyage over the sea of death will cure the last Christian invalid. There grows an herb on that hill that will cure the last snake-bite of earthly poison. No hospital there, no dispensary, no medicines, no ambulances, no invalid-chair, no crutches, no emaciation, no spectacles for poor sight, no listing of windows to keep out the cold blasts; but health immortal for the resurrected bodies of the righteous.

Again, the body will be POWERFUL. Walking ten or fifteen miles, we are weary. Lifting a few hundred pounds makes us pant. Unarmed, meeting a wild beast, we must climb, run, dodge, or somehow get out of the way. Eight hours' work makes any man tired. But the resurrected body shall be mighty. God always will have great projects to carry on, and will want the righteous to help. We know not what journeys the resurrected may have to take, or what heavenly enterprises they may have to carry on. I suppose the heavenly city is more busy than any earthly city; and that Broadway at noon-day is quiet compared with the business of heaven. Yes, it is noon-day all the time, and all Heaven is coming and [illegible]. They rest not day nor night, in the lazy sense of resting. They have so many victories to celebrate! so many songs to sing! so many high days to keep! They need no night; for their eyes are never weary. They need no sleep; for there is no call for physical renovation. If they sit down under the tree of life, it is not to rest; but with some soul of earth to talk over old times, and rehearse the battles in which they fought shoulder to shoulder. Jacob wrestled with the angel but was not thrown because the angel favored him; but Jacob once resurrected, an angel could not throw him. There would be no such t[illegible] wrestling down the giants of [illegible]. They are strong, supple, unc[illegible]able, immortal athletes.

That kind of a body I want. There is so much work to be done that I now begrudge the hours for sleep and necessary recreation. I sometimes have such views of the glorious work of preaching the Gospel that I wish that from the first day of January to the last day of December, without pausing for sleep, or rest, I could tell men of Christ and Heaven. Thanks be to God for the prospect of a resurrected body that shall never weary, and for a service of love and activity that shall never end.

O glorious day of Resurrection! Gladly will I fling into the grave this poor, sinful frame, if at Thy call I may rise up with a body tireless and pure, and glorious, and immortal! That was a blessed resurrection-hymn sung at my father's burial;

"So Jesus slept—God's dying Son;
Passed through the grave, and blest the bed.
Rest, here, blest saint, till from his throne,
The morning break and pierce the shade."

The Test of Discipleship.

Many are called, but few are chosen, are words which bear on the question of spiritual fitness for the higher services of God and humanity here, as well as on the final salvation of men in the hereafter. Of the many who came to Jesus in the days of his flesh, but comparatively few met the demands of soul stature required of those, who were mustered into the army of the living Lord. While Christ's drawing power is unfolded in the sacred pages, let us not lose sight of his faculty for dispersing crowds which came around him. When the mob rushed to his side to condemn the fallen woman, one lofty sentiment about spiritual fitness for the judgment of the sinful, sent them all out from his sight. Multitudes pressed near him when they saw his powers of healing, and his miracles to meet carnal wants, but he had a way of setting God, duty, and self-denial before men's eyes, so as to make easy reckoning of his steadfast followers. Even when some higher truth of the unselfish life was proclaimed by his lips, a murmur ran along the line of professed disciples: "It is a hard saying—who can bear it?" When, as Captain of our salvation, he stormed the highest ramparts of hell and sin, he had to do it alone. In the terrible hour of danger and death, "they all forsook him and fled." And of the great throngs thrilled by his eloquence, touched by his kindness, and charmed by his love, we find only a hundred and twenty after his death devoted by Eternal ties to his service, waiting at Jerusalem for the promised Spirit, and ready in the face of persecution to carry his commission to the corners of the earth.

It may be in our love of and anxious haste for numbers, we have lost sight of Christ's law of selection in building up the church. Membership should be measured by quality. Thus we find Jesus ever cautioning his hearers under the spell of enthusiasm his own words created. It was said of him, "He spake as never man spake." This commendation of his preaching belonged to what he said, and the way he uttered it. Themes of eternal life and destiny, which earth's greatest scholars stammered over in ignorance or spoke about in doubt, he handled more easily than we repeat the alphabet. He spoke, too, from a soul on fire. His teachings did not flow from his lips like the water from the cold stone fountain, but as the crater's mouth grows warm with the lava, his whole being glowed as he poured out his thoughts upon the people. His ministry made stirring impressions on the multitudes. It could not be otherwise. Just as living bodies must feel the heat of the sun, so—standing in his presence, uttering earnestly to them what he felt and knew of God and another life—men had to be moved if, in their souls, there was anything left which responded to truth, honor, and the glorious thoughts of immortality. But like all true thinkers, he saw there was danger that these impressions would be but momentary. And so, before commitment to his cause, he advises the "counting of the cost" principle. It was continuation in his work and word which made true discipleship manifest.

There probably never was a time, when, more than now, caution in the ministry was sacrificed to the charm. We think preaching, on the whole, never was more pleasing or less profitable than now. Themes to allure the multitudes and work them up into admiration of the pulpit, go forth to the world on the pages of the press—but which, alas! leave little, if any permanent results on the character in the way of converted souls and changed lives, to meet the judgment seat of God. There is a great difference between making men passing admirers of the preacher, and permanent adherents to the truth and doctrines of our Lord. Success does not always stand in crowds attracted, nor failure in congregations falling off. Gideon's victory lay in getting rid of the rabble to those who had the root of heroism in them. The lesson of it all is, be not discouraged or dismayed. When the test of true discipleship comes, we shall see the exact number our ministry has influenced to make God's word "the man of their counsel and the guide of their lives." We know some unknown to fame—in obscure corners of the vineyard, with whom many a popular and renowned preacher might gladly exchange places, when the light from the Throne shall gleam on their life work in the last Great Day.—REV. JOHN PEDDIE in Baptist Weekly.

A Word at Night.

Everybody's life is like a book. Every day is to each one like the leaf of a book. Every thought, and word, and act, is like the words we read on the page. God reads this book of life which each one of us makes.

God's word is said to be A LAMP and A LIGHT. If we take his Word as the light, we too may read all our life like a book.

Dear little one, when night comes ask him to give you light, that you may see how you have lived through the day, and whether you have put only good things into your book of life.

Communications.

The Church.—No. 2.

C. C. M.

It is thought by many good people that in the organization of a church it is proper and expedient to have some sort of a simple, Scriptural covenant, to which all who belong to the Society are to subscribe their names. Something like the following answers for this purpose:

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. (2 Tim. 3: 16, 17.)

We, whose names are here subjoined, do hereby agree, by the help of the Lord, to walk together as a church of Christ, faithfully maintaining its ordinances, taking the Bible as our only rule of faith and practice, church order, and discipline, making Christian character the only test of fellowship and communion.

We further agree, with Christian fidelity and meekness, to exercise mutual watch-care, to counsel, admonish or reprove, as duty may require; and to receive the same from each other as becometh the household of faith.

It will be observed that no human name or human creed is imposed by this covenant. All of its stipulations are in perfect harmony with the Bible. It specifies nothing but Christian duties, such as maintaining the ordinances, exercising mutual watch care over each other, etc., etc. No one will deny but that these are duties repeatedly enjoined upon the church in the Scriptures. They are also often treated of by the minister in the pulpit, as well as by the church in the social meeting. But the objection to it is that it is "written out and subscribed to." In reply to this it may be asked: Is it any worse to write than to preach? Do you not subscribe to those duties when you recommend them in your social meetings; and if so, why not put your name down to them, so your subscription may be seen as well as heard? What more harm can there be in subscribing to a thing in one way than in another? And there is no danger of bearing too many testimonies to Christ, or witnessing for him in too many ways.

A HUMAN MARK.

Some suppose that a church organized with the above covenant would be a human compact kept together by a human mark. In the same sense, that every Christian grace and ordinance becomes human when human beings enjoy and observe them, it is true, but in no other. This covenant is copied by human hands, and in this sense is human. So with a sermon; the preacher is human, and, although the sermon is God's truth, yet so far as the preacher is concerned, it is a human effort. Are we therefore to reject it? How much of practical Christianity would we have left if this principle should obtain in ever particular.

EPISCOPACY.

A recent writer has truly denominated it "the foe of God and man." Another regards it as "one of the corruptions of popery." And still another says, "it is a pernicious encroachment on the rights of men, for which there is no authority in the Scriptures." Very true, it is that the Episcopacy has wrought much mischief in the Christian church. But it is a groundless and ignorant notion to suppose that all church organization is a species of Episcopacy. This supposition has driven many to repudiate all forms of church government in toto. This is very unwise. It is simply the opposite extreme on the subject, and is doubtless as far from the truth as the other. The Christian Church had organization and church order long before Episcopacy had an existence. This is easily shown from history, as well as from the Scriptural accounts of the Apostolical era. Episcopacy was simply an innovation and corruption introduced into the church long years after its establishment.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

There are many passages of Scripture that clearly recognize the fact of church government. Such for instance as the following:

"Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if we will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican." (Mat. 18: 15-17.)

"To deliver such a one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Your glorying is not good. Know ye that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us: But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person." (1 Cor. 5: 5, 7, 13.)

"A man that is a heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject; knowing that he that is such is subverted, and sineth, being condemned of himself." (Titus 3: 10.)

Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly. (2 Thess. 3: 6.)

"Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." (Acts 20: 28.)

The fact of church government of some sort is clearly recognized in these quotations. We would not gather the idea from their reading that the community of which they speak was a loose, disorganized, indefinite company of persons; but on the contrary we should think they were closely compacted and working together under the most rigid discipline. The idea of each local church having those duly appointed as "overseers" of the flock, has in it the appearance of "church order." The rejection of the "heretic" after the "second admonition" also suggests that things were done "decently and in order." From any "disorderly" member the church at Thessalonica was imperatively exhorted to "withdraw." But it would be impossible to pursue such a course as this unless it were well understood who composed the church. In the case at Corinth the "wicked person" was to be "put away" from among the church of Christ, which indicates most unmistakably the perfect organization of that church and its power to receive or disfellowship its members, as the case might be, worthy or unworthy. Then again after certain duties are performed with an offender, the offense is to be explained to the church, and the church is to take final action in the case, by which the offending party unless he shows penitence, is to become "as an heathen," or outsider. Are we to understand by this that all in the community who in any way profess Christ are to be called together in a promiscous gathering and the matter explained to them? Or does "church" here mean a community of saints who by common consent are walking together; and whose duty it is to maintain the discipline of the gospel? I confess the latter looks the more plausible. It appears evident from the testimony already adduced that the Scriptures recognize the fact of church government. As to the nature of that government we must consult other passages.

OFFICERS.

All government is nugatory and useless until offices are constituted and the proper officers duly appointed to put the laws and regulations of the government into execution. This fact applies fully to church government inasmuch as such a government is recognized in the Scriptures. If God has given his people a system of government, then we shall expect to find that government provided with well defined offices, the duty of the incumbents of which shall be to see that the laws and regulations of said government are duly maintained.

ELDERS (PRESBYTERS) AND BISHOPS.

That these titles describe the same office is abundantly evident to the Bible student. We claim they are only different designations of the same office from these reasons:

1. The original words presbuteros and episcopas, from which we have elder and bishop, are supposed in the New Testament to represent the same thing.

2. The "elders" are called "bishops" in some instances. This would be inadmissable if they were distinct and separate offices. The "elders" of the "church of God" at Ephesus were "bishops," or "overseers." Overseers in this case is from episcopos, the Greek for bishop. (Acts 20: 17-28; see also Titus 1: 5, 7.)

3. In 1 Tim. 3, Paul describes two offices—"bishops and deacons." In his description of the bishop's office he describes just such an office as in other portions of the Scripture attributed to the elder. Hence they must be the same. It is not to be supposed that there would be two offices in the Christian church having the same functions. Consult Acts 20: 28; Jas. 5: 14. Here the elder is represented as caring for and ruling the church—just the work attributed to the bishop in 1 Tim. 3.

Never.

A. ARMOUR.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." (John 8: 51.)

This, and kindred scriptures, have been often referred to in THE A. C. TIMES of late. Eld. Goodenow, in the issue of June 10, bases an argument on this passage which has, so far as I have seen, not been refuted. To say that his arguments pass away like the dust and smoke of battle, and leave us more convinced than ever that we are right, and he is wrong, is very like saying, "A man convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still!" Others can use that argument as well as we: and, I hope they use it oftener.

I will state Eld. Goodenow's argument briefly, referring the reader to his own article, as above, for his views in full. On John 11:26—"Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die"—he says it signifies non-occurrence, not that he "shall die, but not forever," but that Christ meant to say absolutely his disciples should not die, ever at all, in the sense he used the word death. And this view he finds even stronger support for in the text at the head of this article, because the Jews—believers in a resurrection, and that literal death was "not forever"—said, "Now we know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead, and the prophets; and thou sayest, if a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death."—(John 8:52.)

I need not quote further on this point, as I fully agree that Christ did not mean "he shall die, but not forever."

Another point made is, this not seeing death is predicated only of the believer, whereas dying and rising again is true of all, whether they keep Christ's saying or not. Thus far I agree with our author; but in the true solution I differ.

The question with me is, not so much "What did Christ mean?" as, "What did Christ say?" I understand him to mean just what he said. If he did not, who can tell what he did mean? He said, in John 8:51, thanaton ou mee theoreesee eis ton death not not shall see in the aiona.

Death, thanatos, kills;—Rev. 2:23, 6:8. Not not, a double negative, emphatic—by no means. Shall see, in the future tense, see—experience. In eis—this is rendered for in the English version. This preposition is used, like others in the Greek, with great latitude of meaning. The primary meaning is to, unto, or towards; but that is not its most common meaning. In the New Testament it is most frequently rendered into, next in number of times unto, then in; also on, upon, for, till, at, against, among, etc. In my Greek Lexicon in is given as the first rendering of eis, and I would here translate it in. The, the definite article, it points out a particular noun, already mentioned or otherwise understood. Age, aiona, a period of time, the lifetime or duration of any thing. "The age" is the New Testament title for the future, or world to come, given to it by way of eminence. There are past ages, a present age, and ages to come. Christ "appeared in the end sunteleia—the coming together, joining—of the ages, aionon."—(Heb. 9:26.) Then was the end of the Jewish age, or world, or ever, and the beginning of this. And in the ancient church "the powers of the world to come, mellontos aionos, the future age were seen."—(Heb. 6:5.) Some dead were raised, some sick healed, some vipers shaken off without harm.

The coming age is ushered in by the coming of Christ, and the resurrection of them that are his. The wicked are also raised, and judged, and in the lake of fire they die the second death; for "the wages of sin is death." "It is appointed unto men—men in general, men as men—once to die," but "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." When? Not till Jesus comes.—(1 Thess. 4:16.) And the coming of Christ begins "the day of the Lord."—(1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Thess. 2:1, 2.) Some shall die on that day, it is the "day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men;" but, says Jesus, "If a man keep my saying, he shall by no means see death IN THE AGE." He meant the future age; the Jews perversely understood him to mean this age.

It may be objected that eis ton aiona is used as a phrase, and should be rendered as a whole. No doubt it is so used, and this is, if anything, in favor of my rendering, for eis in compounds almost invariably means in.

Br. G. says truly that to denote "not forever" as opposed to "forever" the expression would be, as in Mat. 26:11, ou pantote "not always." In like manner, had the meaning been "never," that is, at no time oudepote or meedepote would have been used, as in Luke 15:39, twice, "neither at any time," "never." The evangelist had just used this very word meaning "at no time" (John 7:46), "never man spake like this man." Thus we conclude that Jesus neither said nor meant "If a man keep my saying, he shall not see death, forever,"—that is, not always; nor "he shall never see death"—that is, at no time: but he said, and meant, "If any one keep my saying, he shall not see death, in the age,"—the future age. The passage will be parallel with Luke 20:36, "Neither can they die any more," and Rev. 20:6, "On such the second death hath no power."

The same phrase I have rendered "not....in the age" occurs John 4:14; 8:51, 52; 10:28; 11:26; 13:8; a similar expression, Mark 3:29—all are rendered "never."

Criticism is invited.

[NOTE.—We insert the above criticism on Br. Collins' review of Br. Goodenow, and leave it with him, to more fully present his view on this point if he wishes to do so, or to explain if not fully comprehended by the writer.—ED.]

"O Lord God, Thou Knowest."

VIRGIL HUNT.

The above language came from the lips of the prophet Ezekiel. And that which caused him to give utterance to these words is as follows: "The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord, and sat me down in the midst of the valley which was full of dry bones, and caused me to pass by them round about: And, behold, there were very many in the open valley; and lo, they were very dry. And he said unto me, Son of Man, can these bones live? And I answered, "O Lord God, thou knowest." I am led to believe were we to-day to accompany some of our great leading ministers to the many grave yards of earth, and propound the same question, we would receive such answer as, I don't know, it is doubtful, it is not necessary, I don't believe in the resurrection of the body. Another: the souls of these dead bodies are now enjoying or suffering the fruits of their earthly labors; therefore why raise this body?

But Ezekiel was not of that stamp of theologians. Think of his answer: "O Lord God, thou knowest." God now sees his willingness to learn, and commands him: "Prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones hear the word of the Lord: Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones: Behold I will cause breath (not immortal souls from heaven or hell) to enter into you, and ye shall live: and I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live. And ye shall know that I am the Lord. (Nothing about their disembodied souls being brought back yet.)

"So I prophesied as I was commanded; and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking. And bone came to his bone. And when I beheld, lo the sinews and the flesh came upon them. And the skin covered them above. But there was no breath in them. Then said he unto me, prophesy unto the wind, (not immaterial spirits,) Thus saith the Lord God: Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as I was commanded. And the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up on their feet, an exceeding great army." Let me ask you who believe the souls of these dead bodies were in some distant realm prepared for ghosts, why were they not commanded to return and re-enter the body? If the soul be the life of the body, why was not he commanded to say, return ye disembodied souls, enter in and quicken your material bodies? I now propose to answer this qustion for you: and right from the mouth of God too: "Then he said unto me, Son of Man, these bones are the whole house (not a part) of Israel." No doubt this represents the whole Christian family that shall be under the power of death, when Jesus shall come, and the glorious morn of the resurrection dawns. All are in the grave. None of them gone "beyond the bounds of time and space." But all are asleep in Jesus. "Behold they say our bones are dried and our hope is lost." (See 1 Cor. 15-18.)

·Ve are cut off for our parts: there- e prophesy, and say unto them, thus ·h the Lord God, behold, O my peo- , I will open your graves, and cause ·t to come up out of your graves, and ng you into the land of Israel, and shall know that I am the Lord, when ave opened your graves, O my peo- , and brought you up out of your ·aves, and shall put my spirit in you, ·t some human spirit,) and ye shall ·, and shall place you in your own d: And then shall ye know that I · Lord have spoken it, and performed saith the Lord. (Ezk. 37: 1–14.)

·)ear reader, what a beautiful des- ption of the resurrection day, to our w, is here brought. But, alas! ·w it has been marred by the popular ·ology of our age. Did you ever ·ak how the doctrine of man's natural nortality has done away with this ·t of God's plan? If not, look for a ment. From the pulpit to-day may heard this sentence, "The body l never be raised." Some even ieve it impossible; that the soul er dies, hence there will be nothing raise. Over the resting place of the ly is inscribed, "Death eternal." the soul, "Thou canst not die." , what has this theology done? It ·even "robbed God!" It has made ·out a liar! When God says, "O people, behold I will open your ·aves, and bring you up," modern ology say they are not in the grave. ·en God said, "Thou shalt surely ," Satan steps up and says, "Thou ·lt not surely die." And millions g those very words in sentiment. b says, "Man that is born of woman f few days." Modern theology says ·t his days are without end.

·3ut we choose to be of that number o believe God said just what he ant; and meant just what he said. d as he has never revealed ything in his word about "im- rtal souls," "disembodied spirits," ever dying ghosts," we don't pro- e to believe in them. But as he · revealed, that "dust thou art, and o dust shalt thou return;" and fur- r, that the time is coming when the ves of his people shall be opened, l they shall come forth clad in im- rtality and eternal life. Therefore say let God be true if it costs us all · creeds and preconceived opinions. en so. Amen.

The Preaching I Heard.

D. F. CALL.

I had the privilege recently of listen- ; to a sermon preached by a "big n" of the U. B. church. The text s Matt. 6; 20: "But lay up for ·urselves treasures in heaven." He d us that the heaven spoken of was uated exactly in the centre of God's ·iverse, wherever that centre is, and ·n gave us a brilliant description of joys, and said that this was the ·gdom that God had promised to · people. I could not help noticing e difference between the words of e speaker, and the language of in- ·ration. Christ says: "Blessed are o meek, for they shall inherit the ·rth." (Matt. 5: 5.) Solomon says: ·3ehold the righteous shall be re- mpensed in the earth." (Prov. 11: .) And in Rev. 5: 10 John repre- nts the saints as singing a new song, ying: "Thou art worthy to take the ·ok and open the seals thereof, for ou wast slain and hast redeemed us God by thy blood out of every ndred, and tongue, and people, and ·tion, and hast made us unto our God ·ngs and priests, and we shall reign · the earth." Peter says that the ·avens shall pass away, and the earth; ·d the works that are therein shall be ·rned up; "nevertheless we accord- ·g to his promise look for new heavens ·d a new earth wherein dwelleth ·ghteousness." What could be the ·ject of creating a new earth if the ·ints left this earth at death, and were ·ansported to the land of the blessed over the sky, to reign with God forever? Surely they would care nothing for a new earth.

Yet Peter says that we "according to his promise look for a new earth"—according to the promise that God made to Abraham. (See Gen. 17: 8,) that he and his seed should possess the land for an everlasting possession; and in its renewed state it will be given to the saints for an everlasting inheritance. John upon Patmos' isle, in a vision, saw the future home of the saints in the new earth.

The speaker in mentioning the inheritance of the kingdom, said that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, David, Job, and all of the prophets were there; then paused and remarked: "But perhaps some will say, I thought that Abraham and David was dead"; and then answered his own query: "No, sir, they are not dead; they are alive to-day, and are enjoying all the blessings of heaven."

Let us examine this in the light of inspiration, and see the contrast. In John 8: 53 we read that "Abraham and the prophets are dead"; and Peter tells us that "David is both dead and buried." (Act 2: 29); and David himself said that in "death there is no remembrance" even of the Lord. (Psa. 5: 5), and that "the dead praise not the Lord." (Psa. 11 5: 17.) The wise man says, "The dead know not anything; neither have they anymore a reward." (Eccl. 9: 15.) The word of the Lord that came to Hezekiah was "Thou shalt die, and not live." (Isa. 38: 1.)

Here is quite a different view of the subject from that taken by our orthodox brother who would have the dead alive and in possession of all their mental faculties, singing God's praises in heaven, forgetting that Paul had said, "These all died in faith not having received the promises," for the simple reason that God has "provided some better things for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." (Heb. 11: 13–40.) God proposes to reward his children all at one time. In the harvest the sheaves are all gathered at once. The children of Israel passed through the Jordan all together; and when our Joshua shall come and lead through the Jordan of judgment we shall all go together. We will all receive our wedding garments at the same time; we shall all receive our penny, all be gathered into our Lord's garner, all receive our crown of righteousness at the same time, immaterialists to the contrary notwithstanding. Our orthodox brethren must be hard pushed when they have to rely solely on assertions to sustain their views of immortal-soulism—a theory which they in a measure acknowledge cannot be proved by the Scriptures, except by inference, and that indirect; yet they will point you to the heathen and bring forward their superstitious notions of a spirit land filled with ghostly shades of departed human beings; and they will triumphantly adduce this as conclusive evidence that man is immortal. Oh, shame! How is the glory departed from Israel when the professed followers of Jesus Christ will leave the word of the true and living God, and appeal to the heathen to prove the cardinal point in their doctrine. "To the law, and the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." (Psa. 8: 20.)

COVETOUS persons are like sponges which readily drink in water, but return very little until they are squeezed.

WHEN Dean Stanley went to visit the grave of John Wesley near the City road chapel, he asked the old sexton whom he met there, if the churchyard was consecrated ground. "Yes," said the devout Wesleyan, "consecrated b— the dust of the venerable servant God."

Truth and Fable.

MISS LIZZIE CLOSMAN.

Truth, like her divine source, has always been spurned and rejected by the human family in the aggregate, although coming to them clothed in a halo of light, scattering gems and pearls, yea gifts of which these are but faint emblems wherever permitted to enter. Still, strange to tell, she is often thrust from the door of those whom she would benefit, and, notwithstanding her heavenly birth, she seems sometimes to be left almost to perish in naked purity with but few to mourn her low estate. But, God protected, she has lived ever pleading and waiting, generally turned from the abodes of the rich and honorable, yea from those also who boast of worldly wisdom, who might plant her standard high and waft her benefits from shore to shore, she has turned sadly away to find friends amongst the lowly. Here she walks hand in hand with her sister, Love, quietly yet surely rising and spreading in all the majesty and strength of her inborn nature, lifting her friends above care and the sting of poverty, and giving in exchange for the gilded toys and bubble of life unfading riches in realms of light till Lo! a great army that no man can number is found on the shores of immortality, having crowns, and harps of gold singing the song of Moses and the Lamb.

But see the reception the world gives to Fable, her most bitter enemy, and mark the contrast. She comes tripping along on the higher walks of life, or rolling in luxury, disdaining the poor, scattering false jewels and diamonds of paste, and although her vaunted offer of gold proves but "pinch-back at best," she is gladly received wherever she goes, in all the assemblies of the rich and gay she finds willing aries, and no place is so honorable at she may not be admitted. Th ress (with a few worthy exceptions) is a most obedient servant, sending broadcast over the land her pernicious effusions, varied so as to reach all classes, producing a world-wide desire for the unreal and imaginary, amounting almost to a mania, destroying all relish for that which is pure and substantial, keeping the mind in a state of unrest, grasping for that which is unattainable, until very often the most serious results follow. The doors of the lecture-room, and even the Senate, are thrown wide open for her entrance; the theatre bids her tarry with them to make her home there: not yet content, she flatters and deceives until she is carried by the proud mammon-worshipper into the house of God. Once here she strives to hide her deformity from the keen, searching eye of the Divine Spirit by concealing herself within the folds of Truth's own bright cloth; thus in the garb of this angel of light she sometimes succeeds in drawing to her standard the unwary among the lovers of Truth. Even the nursery may not be kept sacred from her polluting breath. Should a few by great vigilance be able to keep the home sanctuary pure, the little ones are almost doomed to make her acquaintance at Sabbath school. Here a few of the wise have taken upon themselves the task of abstracting the essence from the Word of God and administering it indiscriminately, requiring all to look through the vail that Dame Fable has thrown over their own eyes, thus the plastic mind of childhood, instead of being fed with the pure milk of the Word, is drawn into the clouds and fogs of theology, with only here and there a ray of Truth. Happy they who are able to keep their eye on that as a beacon light that will guide them clear of the rocks of infidelity, upon which so many are being shipwrecked. We rejoice to know that although they may both enter the same church, or even the same family, or walk side by side through the journey of life, opposite in nature as light and darkness, they can never unite; they will remain antagonistic till each her mission has performed; then the sifting time will come when Truth, untrammeled by the sin of earth, shall wing her way until Fable, with her votaries, sink abashed from the presence of Truth's glorious author, to perish in their own corruption; then will Truth return to distill her sweets upon the redeemed in the home of the pure.

Let Brotherly Love Continue.

M. E. ORR.

This very important injunction of the Apostle Paul, was addressed to his Hebrew brethren, and would it not be well to give the subject a passing notice at the present time, and so stir up the pure minds of the brethren of this nineteenth century, provoking them to love and good works? But we will read what the great apostle to the Gentiles says touching this matter: "But as touching brotherly love, ye have no need that I write unto you, for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another." Love to God, and love to man, is one of the first principles taught in the word of God, and would to God it were more generally carried out in these last days. But how often do we see strife and animosity existing where love and peace should reign? Brethren, this ought not to be. Let me exhort you to heed the apostle's words: "Be ye kindly affectioned one toward another, with brotherly love, in honor preferring one another." If this divine admonition could be engraven on every christian heart, there would be less strivings for the "mastery," less fault-finding, and evil speaking, and instead of trying to crush an erring brother, the hand of love and friendship would be extended to restore such an one in the spirit of meekness. Jesus, our great exemplar and teacher, came to this world to seek and to save that which was lost. The poor, the sick, the blind, the erring, were all subjects of his love and mercy. In view of this fact, the apostle speaks to you on this wise: "Put ye on, therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long suffering, forbearing one another." "If any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye, and above all put on charity which is the bond of perfectness."

How explicit is the word of God on this matter of christian love and fellowship. Even the psalmist, David, in contemplating it was led to exclaim: "Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity;" and the Savior, just prior to leaving his disciples, said: "And this is my commandment, that ye love one another, even as I have loved you." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples when ye have love one for another."

ONE says, "I will give you to-morrow," to excuse himself from giving to-day. Alas! do you know whether you shall be alive to-morrow in this place? Another says, "I am poor, I have need enough myself for all my means." Yes, you are poor, you are destitute, but it is of love, of benignity, of faith, and of mercy. A third says, "Whom do I wrong? I keep only my own." I ask you, From whom did you receive those riches? and whence did you bring them? Did you not come naked from your mother's womb, and shall you not return naked to the dust? Whence did this wealth come? From chance? What is this atheism? If you confess that you received it from God, why did it fall to your lot rather than another's? God is not unrighteous in the unequal division of property among men. Why are you rich and that man poor? It is that you may receive the reward of dispensing your goods faithfully, and that the poor may receive the recompense of his patience. When, therefore, you appropriate to yourself the wealth which belongs to many, and of which you are only the steward, you act unjustly.—Basil.

The Christian Life.

Waiting still for Jesus.

To all who are looking for the coming of the Blessed Saviour these lines are affectionately dedicated.

BY D. O. HINE.

I'm waiting still for Jesus—
For Him, who once was slain—
According to his promise
To re-appear again:
Yes, waiting still for Jesus,
Who, the heavens will retain,
Till the times of restitution,
And then he'll come again.

I'm waiting still for Jesus,
Who now is my High Priest,
And through his intercedings
I'm blest with God's free grace;
Yes, waiting still for Jesus,
God's well beloved Son,
Who shall appear in glory,
To reign on David's throne.

I'm waiting still for Jesus,
Though many years have flown,
Since first I heard that blessed truth
That soon my Lord would come;
Yes, waiting still for Jesus,
Though often it is said
He will not come for many years—
His coming is delayed.

I'm waiting still for Jesus,
Yes, waiting Lord for Thee
To come again in glory
And set creation free—
Forever free from sorrow,
From sin, and death, and pain;
Oh! hasten that bright morning—
Dear Saviour, come again!

I'm waiting still for Jesus,
And while I wait I pray
That I may labor faithfully
For Jesus every day;
That, when at last he cometh,
His glory I may share,
I'm waiting still for Jesus,
And trust I shall be there.

Beautiful Extract.

A Sabbath-School superintendent, wishing to have a great commemoration of the Christmas time, built up tier after tier in the spacious cathedral, and arranged trees between them, hanging cages of canaries among the fragrant branches. Over the cages, he suspended blankets. When the time arrived, and the children filled aisles and transept, and the charmed spectators crowded the galleries, all at once the blankets were lifted, and the sunlight, the warmth, and the fragrant trees, woke up the slumbering birds, who broke forth in tuneful song, filling the whole space with delicious music. To complete the charm, the children raised their harmonious voices, and gallery on gallery swelled the great volume of melody as it ascended in that grand song, "All hail the power of Jesus' name!"

Christ is building tier upon tier in the temple of the heavens, where he is suspending the caged birds of melodious voices among the invisible groves of the tree of life. Soon will the high day arrive the angel's trump sound, and the blankets of the grave be raised, and the warmth and light and beauty of Heaven will waken every tuneful power, and the assembled angels and archangels will sing with the redeemed and astounded saints, "All hail the power of Jesus' name!' filling the whole Heavens with one volume of unequaled song, great as the voice of many waters and of mighty thunder, harmonious as the concert of ten thousand harps.—Bishop Thomson's "Evidences of Revelation."

O MY God, who seest me write and recordest in the book of thy remembrance more faithfully my sins and backslidings, bring down my soul to repent in dust and ashes for my waste of time, carnal complacency, and self-sufficiency. I would desire to devote my self anew to thee in Christ; though I fear I hardly know what it means, so great is really my ignorance of myself. —Henry Martin.

NEGLECTED DUTY.—One of the saddest thoughts that weigh upon the heart of the sincere Christian is that of opportunities for doing good which have been wasted. Their shadow returns upon the mind like a night-mare. The blanks in life contain more guilt, perhaps, than its blots. The devoted Archbishop Usher, after fifty-five years of earnest labor in the ministry, uttered the following prayer on his deathbed: "O Lord, in special, pardon me my sins of omission!"

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, September 2, 1873.

Board Meeting.

The members of the Board of the W. A. C. Publishing Society are hereby notified that a meeting of the Board will be held on the 16th day of Sept., 1873, at the office, No. 25 West Lake street, Chicago. The object of said meeting is to either cancel its debts in full, or to lease the property to a party or parties (if they can be found in whom the board has confidence), who will publish the A. C. TIMES in harmony with the requirements of the lease, and assume the debts.

D. MATHEWSON. President.

ABOUT next week we hope to be able to tell when the "Disembodied State" will be ready for circulation. Orders are coming in.

SOME of our correspondents write with a pencil. Please do so no more. Use good ink, and take pains to write every word plainly.

WE are obliged to abridge the notices of many meetings, for want of space. Let brethren study brevity in writing notices. Leave out your appeals.

WE expect to be gratified with a visit to the Southern Wisconsin camp meeting, where we hope to meet a goodly number of fellow-laborers, and waiting saints.

WE hope soon to hear cheering news from our camp meetings just closing, and those soon to begin, in the different States. These feasts of tabernacles, if rightly conducted, give health to the body at large.

BR. and SR. MANSFIELD will leave their work in Chicago to meet with the brethren in camp, September 5, at Sparta, Wis., and in Minnesota on the 10th. Will also visit the church at Minneapolis, being absent about four weeks.

BY looking at our list of donations and pledges, it will be seen that our brethren are waking up to this financial question. But many are yet only looking on to see others lift, and do not as much as cheer them. Will not such take their turn?

ELD. L. C. COLLINS intends to meet the friends at the Sparta camp meeting, Wisconsin, and will gladly accept aid for the society, or remittances for the paper. Br. Hough also will attend to anything in this line. God bless the meeting.

AN exchange makes the following statement:

> "The first steeple on a Methodist Church in the world was placed on the church in Marlboro street, Newport, R. I. Bishop Asbury was greatly disturbed by it, and when he saw it, exclaimed, "Organs and choirs will come next!"

The bishop was not mistaken.

THE evenings are now lengthening, and will soon be long enough to favor protracted meetings. We trust the present autumn will be wisely improved by our ministers in efforts to save the perishing, and to enlighten those who are groping in theological darkness. Lay your plans in season, and waste no time.

BR. L. C. COLLINS has not written much for the paper of late, owing to being busily employed in erecting for himself a dwelling near our printing office, which is now approximating its completion. If any one doubts his interest in the cause, just look at his noble pledge of $500 to free the Society from debt. Who will show a deeper interest?

Destruction.

I have never heard but one Adventist preach; his preaching has caused considerable excitement here in regard to the coming kingdom, and the destruction of the wicked. But the most of us are unlearned, and when we came to the 9th chapter of Mark 43d, and onward, we lack knowledge, being ourselves but babes in Christ. We know you have brethren that can give us some light on this subject. Will you please give us an explanation of the above named Scripture through THE TIMES, and oblige many honest inquirers after truth? Your brother in hope of the coming of Christ, ADAM HART.

An extract from our "Life and Death Theology" will furnish the information sought for:

Having learned that the physical man is to enter this hell of fire after the resurrection, we are prepared to inquire whether this is a hell of preservation, or a hell of destruction? The Savior gives a definite answer to this question: "Fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell [gehenna]." (Matt. 10: 28.) Here the fact is stated that "both soul and body" go to gehenna to be destroyed. "Destroy" cannot mean to preserve. It is the nature of fire to consume; and to talk of casting anything else into the fire would be deemed equivalent to a threat of destruction, even without saying that it was for that purpose. Then when in addition to this fact it is expressly stated that they shall be destroyed, how can we come to an opposite conclusion? Let us hear the Savior again: "And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed than having two hands to go into hell [gehenna], into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thy foot offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet to be cast into hell [gehenna], into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into [gehenna] hell-fire: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. * * * * Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another." (Mark 9: 43-50.)

Gehenna, here translated "hell," instead of conveying the idea of preservation, is the strongest term in the whole Greek vocabulary to express total consumption. Says Greenfield: "Gehenna, proper the valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem, once celebrated for the horrid worship of Moloch, and afterward polluted with every species of filth, as well as the carcasses of animals, and dead bodies of malefactors; TO CONSUME WHICH, in order to avert the pestilence which such a mass of corruption would occasion, constant fires were kept burning." (Greek Lexicon.)

"Our Lord seems to allude to the worms which continually preyed on the dead carcasses which were cast into the valley of Hinnom, gehenna, and to the perpetual fire there kept to consume them." (Parkhurst's Greek Lexicon.) And Parkhurst again remarks: "A gehenna of fire does, I apprehend, in its outward and primary sense, relate to that dreadful doom of being burnt alive in the valley of Hinnom."

Here is the origin and meaning of the word gehenna, employed by the Savior to portray the coming doom of the impenitent. Old gehenna is made a type, by divine selection, to prefigure the destiny of the wicked. Then let us look at the typical gehenna in contrast with the antitypical gehenna, and thus learn the lesson the Savior designed to teach. Nothing was cast into typical gehenna to be preserved, but to be CONSUMED; neither will the wicked be cast into antitypical gehenna to be preserved, but to be CONSUMED. As in the typical gehenna the fire devoured all that was cast inside of the arches, and the worms devoured all on the outside; so in the antitypical gehenna the agent of destruction, symbolized by the worm and fire, will devour the wicked.

We are sometimes told that the worm signifies the sinner's immortal soul, or his guilty conscience. But the fallacy of this assumption is apparent when we pause to notice that the worm was no part of that which was cast into typical gehenna, but merely an agent to consume that which was cast therein: therefore the worm that dieth not is nothing that is to be cast into antitypical gehenna, but merely symbolizes an agent to consume the wicked when they are cast into it. If the agent here symbolized should die, sinners might continue to live. If the fire could be quenched, sinners might escape death; but as it is, sinners must be consumed.

That the "worm that dieth not" is not the soul, or conscience of the sinner is made still more certain by reading the statement of the prophet Isaiah, from which Jesus quotes: "And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me: for THEIR worm shall not die neither shall their fire be quenched." (Is. 66: 24.) A carcass is a "dead body" or "corpse." Do "carcasses" contain a deathless soul, or a tormenting guilty conscience? "Their worm" cannot here mean soul or conscience, but a consuming agent. So also in the Savior's discourse, as he quotes from the prophet. As before shown, at the typical gehenna, the worm and the fire devoured all that was cast into it. Therefore, in the antitype (hell), the worm is no part of the sinner, but simply an agent to consume him. If this agent of destruction is not hindered, if the worm does not die, there is no escape for the sinner, but he must be consumed. To illustrate: We walk out into the farmer's corn field, and discover that a worm has commenced devouring the corn, and readily conclude that if the worm does not die the corn will be destroyed. So with the sinner; if that worm, or agent of destruction, is undying, it will surely destroy him.

"The fire is not quenched." It is therefore perpetual? A fire that cannot be quenched, instead of being endless in duration, is one that cannot be extinguished, and is therefore sure to consume that on which it preys. This is its meaning out of the Bible and in the Bible. We witness a house on fire; the flames are streaming from every part; there is no hope of saving the house, and we say the fire cannot be quenched; and just as truly as this is the case, the house must be consumed. So in the case of the sinner: if the fire cannot be quenched, the sinner must be consumed. It was said of the fire that consumed the gates and palaces of Jerusalem: "It shall not be quenched" (Jer. 17: 27); and of the fire that consumed the Jewish sacrifices, "It shall never go out." (Lev. 6: 13.) But those fires were not perpetual. Still the language used is just as strong as that applied to the sinner. If a disease cannot be cured it will kill its victim. If a fire cannot be quenched, it will consume that to which it is applied. This is both the common sense view and the Scriptural view of the matter, and there is no escape from the conclusion we have reached.

"Every one [of the wicked] shall be salted with fire and every sacrifice [every saint—"present your bodies a living sacrifice"] shall be salted with salt." As salt is a preserving element, so is fire a destroying element. If to salt the righteous with salt (a preserving element) signifies their preservation, then to salt the wicked with fire (a destroying element) signifies their destruction. What can be clearer than this? While the righteous are to be salted with that which will preserve, the wicked are to be salted with that which will destroy. The righteous are thus admonished: "Have salt in yourselves," for the good reason, "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

The Body to be Saved.

Truth has been so supplanted by fables that but few men now contemplate ever being saved themselves; but but when the theme of salvation is introduced, they picture to themselves the salvation of a bodiless spirit at the hour of death, to range some aerial realm inhabited by disembodied souls. But such a spirit salvation is untaught in the Bible. The only scriptural allusion to the spirit's salvation is at a time when connected with the body—"That the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus"—not at the death; and when the "day of the Lord arrives, the resurrection comes. If the spirit has a disembodied existence previously, it must be in an unsaved state.

Those who have been educated to believe that the remedial economy contemplates merely the salvation of the soul, independent of the body, in some ethereal realm, will be surprised to learn how much the Bible has to say about the future of the body. Job exclaimed —"And though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold."-(Job 19:26.) The margin reads—"After I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh [or out of my fleshly eyes] shall I see God." When? "After I shall awake" from the sleep of death. The Douay version reads—"And I shall be clothed again with my skin, and in my flesh I shall see my God." Job's anxieties were not for a disembodied state of bliss immediately after death, but for felicity after the close of death's supremacy over the saints, in his resurrected body. And Paul gives vent to a similar feeling—"Even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body."-(Rom. 8: 23.) Paul's anxiety was not to exist in a bodiless state, but to experience the "redemption of the body"—a work that is never experienced at death, but due only at the resurrection, being then conferred on those who shall be "accounted worthy," of whom the Savior says—"Neither can they die any more."

Nor can there be any mistake as to what body Paul is here speaking about, for in the same discourse, and in the same connection, while speaking of the resurrection of Christ's literal body, he says—"If the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also [or, likewise] quicken your mortal bodies."-(Rom. 8: 11.) Christ's mortal body literally died, and was literally raised, or animated by the quickening "power of an endless life;" so our bodies die; but if we possess the spirit of Christ, we are entitled to the same kind of quickening, indicated by the statement, "shall also quicken [or make alive] your mortal bodies;" that is, just as Christ's body was made alive to die no more;—a kind of quickening that the sinner is not entitled to; a kind of quickening that produces the "better resurrection," of which Christ's is the sample.

When ancient "women received their dead brought to life again" (Heb. 11: 3), those dead ones were quickened, but not with "the power of an endless life," as Christ was, and as the saints are to be; so sinners can and will thus be made to live again without sharing in "the better resurrection," which includes not only the re-organization, but likewise the renovation of the body. God will give "to every seed his own body. . . . So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: it is sown in natural body; it is raised a spiritual body."-(1 Cor. 15:37, 42-44.) Such is the resurrection promised the saints who "sow to the spirit;" they shall "of the spirit reap life everlasting."

Not so with sinners, who sow to the flesh; they shall "of the flesh reap corruption," and "utterly perish in their own corruption," because at the resurrection they will not, like the righteous, "put on incorruption." They will lack the redemption or renovation of the body, which is a component part of the "better resurrection."

Paul looked not for a change at death that should make him a bodiless man, but for a change of the body itself at the coming of Christ that should make the body undying: "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall chance our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."-(Phil. 3 : 20, 21.) Christ's body, the same one that was once dead, and afterwards was "raised from the dead," and now "dieth no more," is here presented as the pattern after which our bodies are to be fashioned. "This mortal must put on immortality."

AS FAITH is the evidence of things not seen, so things that are seen are the perfecting of faith. I believe a tree will be green, when we see him leafless in winter; I know he is green when I see him flourishing in summer. —Warwick.

Purification of Heavenly Things.

A friend asks our mind on the following text—"For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people. . . . .Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle, and all the ministry. And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these."-(Heb. 9: 19-23.)

While it is true that this "sprinkling," which prefigured "the blood of sprinkling," which Peter styles the "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ"-(1 Peter 1: 2), was neither to purge the obedient practitioner from sin, or to purify the actual transgressor, it was simply intended to dedicate the inanimate things to which it was applied in the type, as the tabernacle, the vessels of the tabernacle, the candlestick, the table, the shew bread, and the mercy-seat with its appendages. These inanimate substances had no sins to be purged away by the sprinkling of blood, in the type, but were simply subject to this form of purification as a dedicatory act; and in speaking upon this point, Paul says—"Neither the first testament was dedicated without blood."-(Heb. 9: 18.) The same dedication is here referred to in the antitype, by the purification of "the heavenly things."

These heavenly things," so far as they relate to the "holy of holies," only need dedication, just as the mercy-seat did in the type, and not purification in any other sense; for they have never been polluted. Things that are polluted need to be purged before being dedicated, while unpolluted things only need to be dedicated.

This holds as true in the antytipe as to the type. This consideration shows in what sense the blood of Christ is said to purify "things in the heavens" —the same sense in which they were purified in the type,—merely dedicated. When the same ceremonial was applied to sinners, it was to purge them, as well as to dedicate them. In the type the High Priest offered blood for himself, as well as for the people, to purify both himself and the people from sin; but in the antitype, Christ, our High Priest, had no sins to purge away; so the offering of blood for himself can only be for his purification in the sense of dedication.

Through faith sinners on earth can be made the recipients of the "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ," to purify their hearts, and dedicate them to the service of God. It can just as consistently be affirmed that Christ and "the heavenly things" were dedicated, as that Christ was sanctified; but it could not be truthfully affirmed that they were cleansed from sin.

Spirit and Soul.

BR. W. SHELDON:—Will you please explain the texts in Heb. 4:12, and 1 Thess. 5:23? and you will confer a great favor on those who are seeking for the truth.

Yours in Christ, O. F. GOODWIN.

In these texts Paul speaks about the "dividing asunder of soul and spirit," and about preserving "spirit, and soul, and body." While these scriptures make a distinction between spirit and soul, they do not teach that they are personalities. Our opposers find much more trouble in explaining these texts than we do, for they overthrow the prevalent idea that soul and spirit are two names for one thing, and consequently work ruin to the many expositions customarily given to many texts quoted in refutation of our views; as, for instance: "The spirit shall return to God who gave it." But where will the soul go, seeing it is not identical with the spirit? We are not told that the soul shall return to God. Will the spirit go to one place and the soul to another?

Again: "Cannot kill the soul." But can the spirit be killed, seeing it is distinct from the soul? Or are there really two immortal personalities in each mortal body? Thus, the effort to prove the emigration of the spirit, leaves the soul unprovided for; and the efforts to prove the soul immortal, leaves the spirit out of the question, they being two different things.

Besides this trouble, the query arises, Which is the intellectual entity—soul or spirit? Or has each one an independent intellect, and, consequently, an independent responsibility? If the latter, one may be lost and the other saved. If only one possesses intellect, only one can possess consciousness after they are divided. Then either spirit or soul must be unconscious after death. So much for difficulties growing out of the assumption that soul and spirit are personalities.

It is well known that the term spirit is often used to indicate mind, and soul to indicate life. THESE, as well as the body with which they are connected, can "be preserved blameless;" and these, two, can be divided. Paul would have men sanctified "wholly"—body, life, and mind: "Present your bodies a living sacrifice:" "Your life is hid with Christ in God:" "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind."

Spread of the Gospel.

The Bible, containing the undiluted gospel, is being rapidly scattered to speak forth to the nations the rich truth of Heaven. We copy the following note from an exchange:

> The work of printing the word of God for general circulation among all nations of the earth goes rapidly on. In his annual report, the secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society estimates that during the present century about one hundred and sixteen million copies of the sacred Scriptures, in whole or in part, have been put into circulation by Bible societies alone in various parts of the world. Translations have now been made in two hundred and seventy-seven languages. During the past year the English society has found a marvelous opening in Russia for its work, where it distributed 331,000 copies of the Scriptures in no less than sixty distinct dialects. The entire European field is encouraging. The influence of this wide dissemination of the Bible cannot but prove salutary. We are told by the inspired apostle that the Gospel is God's power to save man, and who can estimate the number who may be saved simply by the reading of the Scriptures in their own tongues.

Questions.

BR. SHELDON:—Please explain, through THE TIMES, Genesis, first chapter, from the third to the twentieth verse. I do not understand how there could be light before the sun was made. Also, how grass herbs were made to grow, and how the trees could bring forth fruit defore the sun was made from whence our planet derives its heat.

I can not harmonize Genesis 32 and 40 with 1 Timothy 6-15. Does not Paul contradict Jacob? John 12-31. What does this verse mean? Also, Matthew 12-28. What kingdom is here spoken of? As there are different opinions about the day that Christ was crucified on, I would be glad to know your views in regard to it.

S. E. LANPHERE.

1. We see no difficulty. God could create light before creating the sun, and subsequently connect it with the sun. This is the view of early expositers.

2. Gen. 32:30 speaks of Jacob's seeing God, while Paul affirms that "no man" hath seen him. Both statements are correct—with natural vision "no man" has seen God, while some have seen him with supernatural vision, by miraculous interposition.

3. The "judgment of this world," mentioned in John 12:31, doubtless refers to its judgment of condemnation against Christ, when, as the "Prince," and Heir, they cast him out.

4. In Mat. 12:28, as in several other texts, a component ingredient of the kingdom, (Christ) is called the kingdom.

5. As Christ rose on "the first day the week," we have only to run back three days and nights to learn when he died, for he was buried "three days and nights."

Our Opinion.

A brother asks our view about the future of THE TIMES—whether we favor the idea of putting the publishing interest into the hands of ten or five men? We are decidedly of the opinion that it will best suit the people on its present basis, if the debts so long standing over us can be paid; and we believe they can be. But if they cannot be paid, something must be done. It might be better to have a paper on the basis proposed than to let it go down. We are in favor of swelling the list of pledges and donations till the possibility of a change shall be exterminated. Some are coming to the rescue, while others are holding back. Let us keep the paper where it is—in the hands of the people—and not be compelled to put it into the hands of a few men, for want of money to meet our obligations. Where are our $500 men? Is there but one, and he a preacher? Where are our $100 men? Are there none of this stamp but poor preachers? Where are the enclosed pledges? Please return them soon, filled out as you feel the Lord would have you donate.

Financial Burdens of Christians.

Are Christians overtaxed to support the gospel? Facts and figures say, No. As a general rule there is a great lack of Christian liberality. The following extract from an exchange is to the point:

> Sometimes Christians are disposed to complain a little at the heavy financial burdens which they have to bear in supporting the gospel. It is to be supposed that all Christian men save the amounts which thousands of others spend for beverages of various kinds. If they do this they can answer all the claims made upon their liberality and yet be better off than their neighbors who keep up the saloons. It is well known that the money which is spent for various kinds of liquor would support all the ministers in the country, build all the new churches that are needed, and support a number of additional missionaries. Take New York as an instance. In that city there is a liquor saloon for every hundred of its population. And these saloons receive more money annually than all the religious contributions of New York amount to, and yet New York churches pay their hundreds of thousands each year. If we have the same disposition to support the gospel that these intemperate men have to keep the saloons going, we shall not soon complain of our burdens.

The State of the World.

The New York Witness thus speaks concerning the present state and future prospects of the world:

> A number of earnest Christians believe that all things in this world are waxing worse and worse, and will continue to do so till the Lord in person shall consume wickedness with the breath of his mouth and the brightness of his coming. We do not subscribe to this view, as we think much is being gained through the efforts of the Church universal in the preaching of the gospel, Christian Associations, Sabbath School Missions and the use of the press. We think also the reflex influence of Christianity in promoting civilization, education and intelligence is doing much. Nevertheless, when we look abroad on the almost universal corruption of political parties and corporations; the willingness of the people to elect the worst man; the fearful strength of popery; the widely withering influence of scientific rationalism and bold infidelity; the eleven thousand dram shops in this city, defying the law, and the authorities winking at them; leading journal advertising assignations, procuresses and abortionists; the waste of more means upon the filthy and offensive uses of tobacco than would be necessary to double all the religious, benevolent and educational efforts of the time. When we see ingenious swindles like the Credit Mobilier participated in by leading statesmen in this model Republic and Canada; seats in legislative bodies, and even on the Bench, made matters of traffic and gain; when the question with grasping monopolists is only whether it is cheaper to buy the electors or the elected, we are apt to exclaim: The whole head is faint and the whole heart sick! Nor is it reassuring to turn to the evangelical churches and see twice as much laid out on edifices as is necessary, whilst the heathen perish day by day. Nor to learn that as much is paid to four men and women with good voices (but probably no other valuable qualification) for singing on Sunday as to the pastor and preacher of the congregation. Or to be informed that Christian ladies, wearing dresses and ornaments costing it may be several thousand dollars, contribute a few cents to a missionary collection. When we see all these things, and a great deal more, we are almost inclined to ask: Are not the Advent brethren right?

More Excellent.

FRANK BURR.

It is a great thing to possess gifts either in a natural or spiritual way. It is a good thing to be able to speak in words of wisdom and to tell of the glories of the coming kingdom, and the excellent plan of God to remove sin and sorrow from our world. But it is more excellent still to have the voice of God whispering peace to the troubled soul. It is more blessed to hear the voice of the spirit within than the voice of man without. It is more blessed to be an heir of the kingdom, and to feel its power within the soul, than to declare its glories with thrilling words to an attentive crowd.

It is a good thing to know all mysteries, and to have great faith so as to be a mighty power for good to others, but it is more excellent to have the "love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost." Men gaze with admiration and astonishment upon the mighty works of knowledge and faith, but the Almighty passes them all by and looks with loving eyes upon a loving heart. Men honor greatness, but God honors goodness. Men make famous those whose deeds are famous, God writes in his book those whose hearts are so pure that he can dwell therein.

It is a good thing to be able to prove the Bible to be the word of God by argument, but greater to prove it true by a life of loving obedience. Better to know that one is begotten of God, than merely know the theory of the new birth.

It is more excellent to know the power of God's grace reigning in the heart, than to know all the minutia of the arrangements of the future kingdom of God.

It is more excellent to feel salvation's power now, than to know all about the plan of saving men from death hereafter.

It is more excellent to be ready to meet Jesus now than to be able to tell the precise time of his second advent.

It is more excellent to know that Jesus sanctifies and saves us wholly, than to seek to unravel theories of sanctification or to explain the ways of God's spirit.

Jesus said to those who rejoiced because they could cast out demons, "rejoice rather that your names are written in Heaven."

Brethren, let us seek the "more excellent way."

Sabbath Schools.

M. D. PEAVY.

One of the main features in a really live church is the interest manifested by its members in the maintainence of its Sabbath schools. There is no interest in the church which needs more care than this. There is no investment which ultimately pays a larger dividend. There is no calling more elevating or ennobling than the guiding of infant feet in the road that ends in glory. There is no ambition more holy than the shaping of youthful minds by the precepts of a Godly life. There is no soul too refined or delicate to invite the ragged urchin of the public way to the Sabbath school, and there instruct his mind in the royal way of the cross. Oh! it would seem that when christians meditated upon this glorious theme, they would be impelled by love to the crucified Savior to rush to the front, and there plant the Sabbath school banner upon the ramparts of a vanquished foe. But as we look around over the flock of God we find comparatively few who are willing to engage earnestly in this wide field where the harvest is already drooping, and the pay is good. On the other hand we find professed christians ignoring the Sabbath altogether, and ever and anon engaged in secular labor upon the Lord's day. Now, this is a deplorable fact. It is a fact of which all christians ought to be heartily ashamed. If it has no other evil tendency, it is setting a seriously bad precept for the rising generation to follow. And another fact is worthy of candid attention. Few churches who have allowed their Sabbath school to die out have survived it but a few months, while no church with a flourishing school is ever found void of vital godliness. This work does not belong to the pastor, but to the members. Brothers and sister, what a field is open before you!

"Ye reapers of life's harvest,
Why stand with rusty blade,"
While the golden grain is drooping,
And day begins to fade?

Immortality.

A. C. GREEN.

"This mortal must put on immortality." (1 Cor. 15:53.)

We find, by investigation, that the word immortality occurs but five times in the New Testament. It is nowhere applied to man in his present state, only by promise—that is, to them who seek for it. (Rom. 2:7.) In Hahn's Greek Testament the word is "Aphtharsiam." It is defined by Liddell & Scott, "Incorruption, Immortality."

ITS APPLICATION.

Paul, in speaking of that great change that is to take place at the sounding of the last trumpet, says: "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." The words mortal and corruptible are their antithesis, and are so used by Paul in 1 Cor. 15:51–54. If man is at present in possession of an immortal soul or spirit, what need of a change when the trumpet sounds? Why do the dead exclaim, after they are brought out of their graves, O, grave, where is thy victory! if the grave has not previously had the victory over them?

IMMORTALITY CONDITIONAL.

Christ "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." (2 Tim. 1:10.) If the gospel or good news that Christ brought is not received, immortality cannot be possessed; otherwise it was not brought to light through (by means of) the gospel. Paul says that immortality is attained by those that seek for it patiently in well-doing; but those that obey not the gospel that Christ brought, and seek it not, indignation and wrath. (Rom. 2:8–6.)

Who hath immortality?-(1 Tim. 6:15–16.) "The only Potentate, the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, who only hath immortality dwelling in the light."

Reader, He has promised to give you and me, glory, honor, immortality, eternal life, if we diligently seek him. Amen.

AT HOME.

—The Chicago and Alton Railroad Company have determined to pay all damages by the recent disaster without litigation. The State laws fix the compensation for a life at $5,000.

—The people at La Cygne, Kan., have taken the law into their own hands. On Wednesday, the 20 inst., they hung a German named Keller, accused of having murdered six persons, two of which had been his wives.

—An accident occurred on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad four miles from Cameron, by which three or four emigrants were fatally injured and fifteen or twenty wounded. The accident was caused by the spreading of the track.

—The Indians made two attacks on the Yellow Stone Expedition, under General Custer August 19, in which they were severely defeated and routed. Gen. Custer's Orderly was killed and 20 of the soldiers slightly wounded. The Indians' loss is estimated at 40 killed and wounded.

—Many of the members of the new Congress have already drawn pay. The Clerk of the House has prepared a list of those whose seats are uncontested and who are entitled to salary without question. Considerable interest is already felt at Washington concerning the organization of the House.

—A most destructive fire broke out in Belfast, Maine, the weather being dry, and a strong gale blowing from the north. It commenced in Dennett's sail-loft, north of R Sibley & Brothers' wharf, and spread with fearful rapidity along the wharves, as far as Carter's ship yard and marine railway, crossing Union street, and extending to High street, consuming all the buildings in a southerly course as far as the house of E. K. Boyle, on High street, where the fire was stayed. Over 125 buildings were destroyed, mostly of wood. The whole loss, as near as it can be estimated is nearly $500,000. Excepting on the two steamboat wharves, with a single exception, all the prominent wharf buildings are burnt. At least 130 families are rendered homeless. A heap of coal, valued at $10,000, was all that was burning when last heard from.

—The verdict in the Broderick case is not one that will satisfy the public. Above all family considerations there are those of society, and above the latter the command of God, which declares that the murderer should be punished. As the crime of shedding blood is now regarded as a trivial one by the juries and judges, it is quite out of place to appeal to any higher sense of duty. The jury, doubtless, had the Walworth case in mind, and it was as well after all to avoid the costly farce of a trial, retrial, and all the quibs and quibbles of our laws. It has been decided by numberless verdicts that one can do what he likes to near relatives or intimate acquaintances, Broderick is sorry for the murder, because it is his own son he killed, and he will doubtless have some annoyance on the subject when he is restored to the social circle. Otherwise we suppose he would treat the matter with the usual indifference displayed by murderers. However, Broderick could not be hung, the only penalty he deserved. The Clinton murder law and the verdict in the Walworth case opposed any such justice.

"Unfulfilled Prophecy."

BR. SHELDON:—I saw in THE TIMES recently, an article from Dr. Barbour, in which he suggests that he "may present at some future time" his application of certain "unfulfilled prophecies."

Now, I have no objections to any man giving his views of unfulfilled prophecy. He has a perfect right to do this, for those prophecies which are of the greatest moment to us are, as yet, unfulfilled. But Dr. Barbour has often laid down the proposition, both in public and in private, that "no man can understand unfulfilled prophecy." I do not claim that he has always acted consistently with this proposition, but he has often avowed it, as a common, if not the most prominent argument against my ideas of the future of Spiritualism as advanced in the "Coming Struggle."

He stated it very positively in preaching on the two horned beast at the Belfast, Maine, camp meeting last fall. But when he was pressing this principle he saw that he was condemning himself in that he had on the same occasion strongly urged in preaching, and through a tract which he scattered there, that the Internationals would every where rise at once for power, on the 19th of that month (Sept., 1878): and that they would be joined by the whole body of the Catholic church in just one month afterward.

Seeing this glaring inconsistency he called our attention to it as a seeming violation of his rule, but then protested on those things he knew he was correct.

Time has shown how far he was correct in such a calculation, and has forced him to attempt an explanation of the reason of his failure on the point. He has done this to several of my friends in northern Vermont, to whom he protested that he failed because he attempted to interpret unfulfilled prophecies, at the same time offering the same principle as an objection to my ideas of the future of Spiritism.

Now I do not want to offer an objection to Dr. Barbour's writing his views of unfulfilled prophecy to THE TIMES, or any other paper, but I think for candor and consistency's sake he ought to preface all such attempts with a plain statement of his own rule, that "no man can understand unfulfilled prophecy," and then proceed on that plan. He protests that nearly all interpreters of prophecy among us "talk like men asleep." Let him see to it that he is "awake" to his situation as an interpreter of prophecy. I. K. LOMBARD.

From J. H. Melven.

After several years of meditation on the subject, I have resolved on entering the field, as a herald of the cross. I am poor and ignorant, but my strength is in God. I earnestly request your prayers in my behalf, that I may "be a good and faithful servant."

Oh, may we all meet on the gold paved streets of the city, when it shall descend to be with man.

Yours in hope of immortality.

From Eld. E. P. Graves, Wis.

Br. Sheldon. I am still looking for that rest that remaineth to the people of God, and expect to get it when Christ shall come. I have just closed the first quarterly meeting for the eastern district of Wis., and had one of the best of meetings: the brethren and sisters all ready for work. Was kindly assisted by Elds. Barnes and Grant. Eight were baptised, and four were added to the church. To God be all the glory.

From Eld. F. H. Kenny, Cherokee, Iowa.

Dear Br. Sheldon:—I have long thought that the brethren in Iowa would like to know what I am doing out here in the western part of the state. Well, I came here last October, and after I got my house so I could live in it, I commenced holding meetings. Found in some places an ear to hear, but in others no interest. So I have done what I could. On the 18th of July I had the privilege of baptising five happy souls, in the Little Sioux, and on the 23d organized a church of seven members, and more will join soon, this being the first Advent church in the county. Here is a large field for missionary labor. Many calls for help, more than I can probably respond to; and having to work to support my family, can do but little to what I could if I could give all my time to the cause of the Master. But the settlers being new comers are generally poor, and can't do what they would be glad to do. So I will toil on in the Master's cause, trusting in God, who hears the raven's cry, and fills the hungry soul. Amen.

From Geo. W. Diller, Lodi, Wis.

Dear Brethren.—It is now about six weeks since I found that God through Christ had pardoned and cleansed me through his blood and I wish to, and my heart's desire is to stand a living witness of and for him. I am young yet in the Christian road, but I feel called to tell "all men" of a Savior's love, who died that I might live, and be a joint heir in the kingdom. Yes, even me the worst of sinners. To him be all the glory. Brethren, do not grow "weary in well doing." God's arm is not shortened; he works to-day, and in a little while he will come again.

What a glorious thought, that we shall be with him then; "and God shall wipe away all our tears." Oh, what a glorious prospect, to be ever with the Lord. I am at Lodi, Wis. There are not many of us here; we need more laborers in this point of the field, but we who are here will work and wait God's own time.

Brethren and sisters, pray for us, that God will raise up a people in Lodi.

From S. E. Lanphere.

We are fast hastening to the close of 1878, and the scenes of every day life declare the end of all things at hand; and as I meditate on these things I ask myself the question, "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?"

As I awake in the morning I think that the Lord may come before night, and as I retire at night I think perhaps he may come before morning; so I pray, "Thy kingdom come." And as I pass along through this world of sorrow and disappointment there is a voice ringing in my ears, saying, Go and tell to the world that Jesus is coming soon, and warn them to prepare for the great and notable day. And almost simultaneously there is another voice which seems to say, You must be a fool to think you can preach; you don't know enough, you would break down if you should undertake it. Every body would laugh at you, and a reproach would be brought upon the cause of Christ. So I stand in a strait betwixt two. Pray for me, brethren and sisters, that I may be strengthened, and that I may have an understanding of God's Word, that I may do my duty, and hear it said, "Well done."

I have lent all the tracts and books that I have received from the office, hoping that they may do good.

From Eld. J. W. Elliot, Missouri.

Beloved Br. Sheldon. As I received the glorious gospel of the kingdom (as it was preached by Jesus and his apostles), more from your preaching than any other source, and your having baptised most of my children, I thought you and the Israel of God would be comforted to know that the light then received has not been hid, and that I am trying to so let it shine that others may be led to glorify God. Last year I held a meeting of eight days to give the reason of our hope, and to save some that are lost, and I trust in meekness showed them the time had come that God's people should "come out of her," i. e. Babylon, where were received the doctrines of devils, and traditions of men. Great opposition was manifested, but gave way before the meeting closed, and one came out and was baptised, and many went to searching the Scriptures to see if these things are so. I have preached most of the time since I came here, and have good attendance, and truth is gaining ground over tradition. Glory be to God; for he has said we shall reap in due time if we faint not. Last Saturday we closed an eight day meeting, and victory perched on the banner of truth. Sr. Prescott, of St. Louis, (as Paul said of certain women) helped me in the gospel, and the Lord poured out his spirit upon her, and the whole place was shaken; five were baptised and sixteen partook of the Lord's supper. Give God all the glory! One Baptist minister received the truth, and helped us preach it. Pray for us.

From S. E. Pearl, Angelica, Wis.

Dear Br. Sheldon:—It is with increasing interest that I am watching those signs in the heavens and earth, the commotions in the governments of the world, the perplexity of nations, and especially the rise of that power indicated in the prophecy under the title of Gog and Magog. I believe this interest is felt by all those who love the appearing of our Savior, to awaken the sleeping saints, and to bring his people into their promised inheritance.

What emotions it awakens in our minds. How we should lift up our heads and rejoice for our salvation draweth nigh. What an interest we should feel in the cause of the Redeemer, not only of our mortal bodies, but also of that inheritance, which is now under the curse, and ruled by sin and sinful man, and how our love should swell and our gratitude rise, when we remember that we are so near the time when sin will be banished, when wickedness and wicked men will be cut off, and [illegible] devoured all on the outside; so in the antitypical gehenna the agent of destruction, symbolized by the worm and fire, will devour the wicked.

We are sometimes told that the worm signifies the sinner's immortal soul, or his guilty conscience. But the fallacy of this assumption is apparent when we pause to notice that the worm was no part of that which was cast into typical gehenna, but merely an agent to consume that which was cast therein: therefore the worm that dieth not is nothing that is to be cast into antitypical gehenna, but merely symbolizes an agent to consume the wicked when they are cast into it. If the agent here symbolized should die, sinners might continue to live. If the who are perishing, to the "ark of safety"? Shall we love Jesus, and neglect to do a single deed of kindness to his chosen ones? [illegible] we fear some who profess faith in his com[illegible] doing. Do we really love our Savior if [illegible] manifest no disposition to serve him?

From Sr. H. M. Dubey, Castle Rock, M[illegible]

Beloved brethren and sisters of Minn[illegible] have obtained like precious faith: I wa[illegible] to talk with you about our camp meetin[illegible] begin to pray earnestly that it may [illegible] great blessing to us as a peo[illegible]. Pray [illegible] all the ministers of our conferenc[illegible] filled with the spirit and that heaven[illegible] may be given them in all th[illegible] plans and arrangements for [illegible] in this part of the vineyard. And [illegible] God's blessing may rest upon other ministers who may be there, that they may be [illegible] with power from on high.

Secondly, ask yourself the question, how much shall I be benefitted by staying away? Don't look at it from a pecuniary standpoint alone. I know it is a busy season, but don't let your cares and work keep you away from the meeting. You have been at work for a long time and God has blessed you in basket and store. Now honor the Lord with the first-fruits of your increase, by giving a few days wholly to his service. Do not throw all the responsibility upon the minister and a few others, but take some of it upon yourselves, feeling you must be there to make the meeting a success, and be there to work. Work just as hard to gather some precious fruit unto life everlasting, as you have to gather in your golden grain. Beloved, you profess to believe that very soon you will exchange your earthly for a heavenly mansion, very soon your corruptible for an incorruptible inheritance, very soon to witness the final separation between those who serve God and those who do not, and you have loved ones unsaved, lost! Are your worldly affairs of more concern to you than their everlasting welfare? O, take them to the meeting, bear them in the arms of faith to Jesus. Prove the Lord and see if he will not pour us out a blessing.

From Mary A. Tibbets.

"Many hands make light work."

The above sentence is well understood and appreciated in all the temporal labors of every day life. And I have felt for months past as from week to week I have read of the continued labors, toils and struggles, of our brethren at the publishing office, to free our valuable paper from debt, that they ought not thus to toil on alone and unaided by those who ought to feel equally interested in the progress of the Advent truth. I have also been gratified in reading some suggestions of dear friends who seem interested in this noble work and as to the means of getting at it. Well, the best way would be to take right hold at once of this heavy load and lift it out of its present embarrassment, as "many hands make light work," as has already been remarked. But if that cannot speedily be done, let us all do the next best; and first, I would say, let every lover of Advent truth do something, just as they are able to afford. And if our brethren wish it done immediately, let us respond and send up the help at once. If it is thought best to wait till the first of January, (as some have suggested,) and then make a general contribution, I am willing for that, or any plan so that the debt is paid.

For myself, I would prefer that something be done at once, as I have found the old saying true, "a bird in hand is worth two in the bush." As a starting point however, I will say there are five members of our family in the Advent church at Volga, and will agree to send five dollars, now or the first of January, just as the brethren at the office shall say they require. This will be giving all the members in every family a chance to do something, some giving more and some less, for I would have every child early trained to benevolence and interest in God's cause, that the habit might strengthen with their years and form a necessary part of an after useful life. I trust that as Adventists, we will make one grand rally and come up to the help of our brethren who are foremost in this great and responsible work.

A Baptist minister thus writes from Arkansas.

I sit down in sorrow to write you a few lines in regard to my whereabouts, condition, and relation to the Baptist church in this association. For the past year all the churches have refused to call me; that is quietly laying me aside as heretical. Two years ago we had a terrific upheaving of orthodoxy, in consequence of the position I took in the debate of a question (query) in the district meeting. I have run my gauntlet. Then and there all (the ministry) pounced upon me. I was exceedingly popular before this time, the acknowledged exponent of landmarks and construction of Baptist doctrine. When lo! all at once I am silenced by the sneer of "soul sleeper," "horrid doctrine," "soul destroying," etc., etc., epithets they used to stop my mouth and all they did or could use to the effect of cutting me off as a minister in the Baptist church. But I still hold my letter in good standing given me by resolution with the balance of the church members when said church was dissolved two months ago, for the want of strength to carry it on, so many had moved off.

I have been in very bad health for six months, but God be praised, I have friends who, like myself, refuse to swallow the pill of "immortal-soulism," and the God slandering doctrine of "endless misery." Many, very many believe with me, but are afraid as yet to take on the name of Adventist. A good, well versed Adventist minister or two would turn the tide mightily. If I attempt to preach they will publish me as an heretic in all the Baptist papers, while I still would be unrecognized as an Adventist minister, therefore without authority or prestige in going forth to "declare the will of the Lord." I don't know what is best for me to do. Advise me; pray for me! I have no society with which I can affiliate as a church.

[Our advice is, do not put your light under a bushel, but let it shine; but use wisdom, and exercise the spirit of love. In due time the Lord will open the door before you, and lead you aright. Can soon send you some publications. ED. TIMES.]

From Eld. Geo. Thompson, Arena, Wis.

Dear Br. Sheldon:—I wish to inform you and the readers of THE TIMES, as well as I can, how I am getting along. I think I am about the same as when I last wrote, although I have at times been much better. Some time ago I came to the conclusion after having tried so many remedies, that no human means would be effectual in my case; so I resolved to commit myself wholly to the Lord—to have him as my only physician. With this resolve I solicited the special prayers of a number of God's dear faithful children, that if it was his will I might be healed. In answer to those prayers he gave me at least a token for good. I improved so much in about one week that I was able to preach two sermons. It was in our own house to be sure, and sitting in a chair; but I could not wait till I got well, or even upon my feet again, to "Tell the old, old story,

Of Jesus and his love."

But I have had a relapse. It may be for the purpose of trying my faith. God knows what is best; but I propose not to relinquish my hold on him, or have any other physician. I have strong faith in the efficacy of prayer. I therefore ask all my dear brethren and sisters to continue to make my case a special subject of their prayers. My case is a stubborn one, but nothing is too hard for the Lord to do. Praise his dear name.

During the year and more past now, in which I have been confined to my bed, I have had many precious seasons waiting on the Lord, and meditating upon his goodness. In the midst of my physical sufferings, which are indeed great, he has led me into green pastures, and by still waters. I have taken great comfort in reading our papers, the Crisis, Banner, and THE TIMES; when I have been able so to do. I am glad that THE TIMES is looking up—that there is evidence of prosperity. I regret that I am not able to render any assistance. Let those that are able rally to help build up the cause. A great consolation to me has been the reception of letters of sympathy from the dear brethren and sisters. Oh, how good it is, when cut off from all social privilege to receive words of good cheer from those of like precious faith. Those who have thus written will please accept my thanks, while they, with others, I trust, will remember me still in this respect. I need not add hardly how good a personal visit is, from such as can make it convenient to do so. May God bless you all.

[We are glad to learn that there are encouraging symptoms in Eld. Thomson's case. Let him be remembered in the prayers and material sympathies of our brethren. It would do our heart good to see our brother again in the gospel field, laboring as in former days. ED TIMES.]

From Eld. Geo. Howard, Wisconsin.

Br. Sheldon:—Thinking you would like to hear something in regard to the cause in new places, I write this: About six weeks ago I received a letter from Br. A. M. Glading, Monroe, Green Co., Wis., asking me to come into his region and hold a tent meeting. In accordance with previous arrangements I left home and took the cars for Monroe, Friday, Aug. 16, at 9 o'clock, a. m., Br. John Emmons going with me.

On our arrival at Monroe we found Br. Glading with his horse and wagon to take us out about twelve miles to the place of meeting. We rode out three miles to where Br. Glading lives, and stopped for dinner. He is settled on a small farm of forty acres, surrounded by timber, with a wife and two children, also his aged father and mother. We found him (although poor in this world's goods,) "rich in faith," and feeling that he is an "heir to the kingdom."

After dinner we all started for the place of meeting, and arrived in time, but found no tent ready, they not expecting us on account of the rain which had been falling during the afternoon. As soon as the friends heard of our arrival, a few of them came together and we soon had everything ready for meeting. So few being assembled, it was thought best to dispense with preaching, so we had a prayer and conference meeting.

The next day (Saturday), the congregation was small, but kept increasing until the close Sunday evening. Br. A. N. Hitchcock came on the grounds on Saturday noon, and it rejoiced our hearts to see his face, as we felt we needed just such help as he could give. Br. Glading preached to us in the afternoon. He is just starting in the ministry, and is well liked by the people with whom he is laboring. He is preaching every Sunday in two or three different places, and the prospect is that good will be done through him, in the name of the Lord. He feels he needs the prayers of all God's children, that he may be sustained in his labors. Br. Hitchcock preached Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, the rest of the time was occupied by myself; and when the meeting closed we felt that some good had been done in the cause of truth as it is in Jesus.

The tent was furnished and lighted by Br. Howe, of the Disciple church, without cost to us, and we found the people ready to listen and we believe willing to accept the truth. As Br. Glading expressed it, every man's house, corn crib, hay-stack and granary was at our service; and when we came away many expressed a desire for us to come again, and preach to them as soon as other engagements will permit.

If any of our preaching brethren can make it convenient to go that way they will find hearts and hands open to receive them, and my prayer is that many may be gathered from that people to live forever in the kingdom of God.

From H. T. Hughs.

And at midnight there was a cry made, behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him.—Matt. 25:6

This evidently refers to the second advent of our Lord Jesus Christ, and admonishes us of the certainty of that event. These words being spoken by Christ himself. Yet we are daily taught by theologians of the present day that this is of minor importance, as the souls of the righteous go immediately to heaven while the wicked are consigned to the dismal abode of Pluto, judgment being at death, and our destiny then being sealed forever.

If the philosophy of Socrates and Plato is true, it would be a matter of indifference to us, but since the Bible teaches that while the bridegroom tarries, the dead sleep, that glorious event should be desirable, and deeply interesting to the world. We are also taught that he will come at a time when least expected, when the world will be slumbering in apparent security. Even the church will have ceased to look for him, a majority of them will have their lamps without oil, though they had been taught to look for him at any moment, and warned to watch and always to be ready, yet at that particular time they will not be prepared. "But as the days of Noe were so also shall the coming of the Son of man be." How unexpected at the dark hour of midnight, when the busy whirl of life will be hushed in the dreams of wealth and worldly honor. The merchant will have counted his profits for the last time, the miser will no longer fear for his golden treasure, the tired husbandman will no longer think of the toils of life, the drunken reveler will have taken the last poisonous draught, and the last prayer will have been uttered. "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven." All alike reposing in unconscious slumber, when suddenly the world will be aroused from slumber, to behold the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven. The day of preparation will have passed, and the solemn realities of the judgment will appear to the wicked. While the righteous will be caught up in the air to meet their Savior. The lamentations of the wicked will be heard and in the last agony of distress calling for the rocks and mountains to fall and hide them from the presence of the Lord, and the fearful retribution of the judgment. What a solemn thought, the judgment: and yet it is certain. We cannot flee from it; all must witness it, whether prepared or not.

Nearly nineteen hundred years have passed since Christ promised his disciples that in a little while he would return again; when that time will be none of us know. It may be very soon, a few years at most, will terminate our earthly career, whether Christ comes or not. Our day of probation for weal or for woe, will then be forever sealed. May the world be aroused from their lethargy and have their lamps trimmed and prepared for that notable event when the wicked will be destroyed, and the righteous will reign with Christ for ever and ever.

A QUAKER, once hearing a person tell how much he felt for another who was in distress, and needed assistance, dryly asked him: "Friend, hast thou felt in thy pocket for him?"

Materialism.

he following article appears in the ent Herald, of July 16th, by J. h:—

"AN OFFER TO MATERIALISTS.

ro. Orrock:—The wonder is often ressed by Materialists that I do see and embrace the doctrine of utter unconscious state of the dead! relieve their minds, permit me to through the Herald, that it is be- se neither Christ nor his apostles o were the true teachers of Christ- doctrine*) ever taught it. Why should I believe it?

y offer is this: When Materalists produce one text from the New tament which teaches the doctrine, dge myself to accept it. J. Litch."

. S.—Will the materialistic papers this offer an insertion, and thus g it before their readers? J. L.

But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach her gospel unto you than that which we have ed unto you, let him be accursed." we said before, so say I now again. If any man h any other gospel unto you than that ye have ed, let him be accursed."—Gal. 1: 8, 9.

me might suppose, by the way J. L. the word "materialists," that such ons are believing in a pernicious damnable doctrine. That he looks in this light is evident, for he ld have his readers believe that were to be accursed. Bro. L. ves in all the materialism those do m he condemns. The difference be- n them is, that in addition to his faith aterialism in common with them, elieves in immaterialism, or Spirit- m. On the nature of man, he is a itualist. He believes that man has l which survives the death of the and lives in a conscious state, ving more, and more alive, than n in the body; and that the souls icked men at least, do communi- with those who are alive in the .

ro. L. plainly gives his readers to rstand that those whom he calls terialists," or who are not Spiritu- s in the sense in which he is, are e accursed, because they preach her gospel from that preached by . I thought I had learned from the that to preach the gospel was to ch the glad tidings of the kingdom od. I am not aware that there is difference between Bro. L. and he calls "Materialists" in their s of the kingdom of God. We perfectly agreed in everything per- ng to the kingdom, which comes r the head of glad tidings. Wheth- he dead are conscious or uncon- s, it has nothing to do with the tidings of the kingdom. But L. seems to think, if we do not ve with him that the dead who are asleep, as affirmed in both the Old and New Testaments, are wide awake, and are more alive than when they died, or went to sleer preaching another gospel, and o be accursed. If he m pas- sage from Paul to se who has differ from him, they ma in turn apply it to him, because he d rs from them. It is said that wh e Pope cursed Luther, Luther in turn cursed the Pope. Why not? Which had the better right?

Bro. L. calls upon "Materialists" to produce one passage from the New Testament which plainly teaches that the dead are unconscious. Why did he not include the whole Bible? Why except three-fourths of all the Scriptures, and ask us to find a certain passage in the other fourth? Is it because he thinks that there are some passages in the Old Testament which plainly teach this doctrine? If not, why does he except this part of the Bible? I think that he as firmly believes the Old as he does the New Testament? I have heard him quote Isaiah 9: 20 to correct or explain Paul in Heb. 11: 26. Bro. L. has not given up the Old Testament as a rule of faith. Why, then, does he make this exception in his proposition? Does he think there is a contradition between the Old and New Testaments on this subject which he is not prepared to explain? As he has not told us why he has drawn a line between one part of the word of God and the other part, we of necessity are left to conjecture.

Suppose the man who does not believe in "the second death," as noted in the last book of the Bible, should ask us to find "the second death" named anywhere else in the Bible, saying, if we can, he will believe it. Or, suppose he does not believe that "the New Jerusalem" is to come down from God out of heaven, and asks us to name another passage in the whole Bible which plainly says this? These propositions would be far more reasonable than the one given by Bro. L. For in the one case the man excepts only one book; and in the other he excepts only one verse, and gives us all the rest of the Bible for our work. But Bro. L. has excepted far more than half of the Bible. Why did not Bro. Litch propose to the "Materialists" to find one passage in God's word that plainly teaches the doctrine in dispute? Or, to make it easier for him, why did he not challenge us to find a number of such passages?

It is sometimes proper to answer a question by asking another. I will ask Bro. L. to give us one passage in the Bible which plainly teaches that man, when dead, is more alive than he was before he died; or, that when he falls asleep in death, he is more awake than he was before he went to sleep. Will he give us one passage which plainly teaches that the soul or spirit of man in death can and does hold conversation with men alive in the flesh? Will he refer us to one passage which teaches that man has an "immortal soul," or that he has a soul that can not die? I suppose that Bro. L. believes God's word—"The soul that sinneth, it shall die." And I suppose he believes that the soul is the man, who lives in the body and controls the body for a time, that is to die, and which is more alive after it leaves the body than before. Now will Bro. L. cite us to one passage in the Scriptures which teaches that that soul will be alive when it is dead?

I am not so much surprised that Bro. L. does not believe in what he calls "Materialism" as I am that he uses such arguments as he has in his writings to support his Spiritualism. I hope that his request will be complied with, and that all the papers he refers to will publish his article. J. S. WHITE.

The Little Outcast.

My dear young readers, I once heard of a little outcast girl, whose father and mother had died, and left her all alone in the world. She had no home, no one to love her, and no one to care for her. She had to go about the streets and beg, and was often tired wandering about, and sometimes very hungry. One day she came to a large farm house and pleaded for a piece of bread, being so h gry, and to be allowed to sit awhile a warm kitchen fire, for it was bitterly , and she was thinly clad—the torn, ered garments were scarcely sufficien cover the shivering child. The little pleader's eyes filled with tears as she spoke to the lady of the house. "Tell me," said the lady, "where is your mother?" "Oh!" said the little, cold, weary, hungry girl, "I have no mother—no mother; I have no kind father or mother—no one cares for me—no one to love me at all. Oh! if some one would only love me, I would be so happy." And again the tears ran down the thin, wan cheek of the child. Softly and gently the lady drew the little outcast to her, kissed her, wiped her tears away, and whispered in her ear—"Dear child, I will be a mother to you."

Sweet image this of a love that has sought, found and saved little outcasts just like you. Ah! my dear young readers, the love of Jesus far surpasses a father or mother's love; for to seek, save and bless you, He came from the bosom of His father. He died on the cross, because he loved you. Now, won't you love him? Your sins he died to put away; but, unlike the poor outcast little girl, who sought a home and some one to love her, Jesus is seeking your love—your heart. He came just to save. I hope to tell you often of this Jesus, of His life—His gracious word—His loving deeds—His kind miracles—His death—His resurrection, and of His going to glory.

THE SUMMER PLAY. Nothing can be more cruel and nothing more foolish than to place children where they must be dressed every day in fresh and fashionable clothes, and their freedom to play curtailed for the sake of appearances. What childhood needs is perfect freedom among things of nature—freedom to romp, to make mud-pies, to leap fences, to row, to fish, to climb trees, to chase butterflies, to gather wild flowers, to live out of doors from morning until night, and to do all those things that innocent and healthy childhood delights in, in cheap, strong clothes provided for the purpose. Exactly that which childhood needs, manhood and womanhood need—perfect liberty and perfect carelessness.—Scribner.

HISTORY OF THE SECOND ADVENT MESSAGE.—The rise, progress and [illegible] results of the proclamation now called 'Second Adventism,' or, properly, the message of the immediate coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrines and messages associated with it; the misguided zeal of some of its friends, errors imbibed and taught, the efforts, bad logic, and arguments of honest opponents to overthrow it; the persecution, strategy, slander, and falsehoods of its enemies, and the wonderful success that has given it in overturning errors, and re-establishing the old fundamental truths of the Bible and primitive Christianity in the hearts of tens of thousands of Christians, sceptics, and infidels, is worthy of being published in a condensed historical form, though time should continue but a little longer.

SCRIBNER's for September has a fair proportion of light and summery, and solid and substantial fare. Bret Harte's "Episode of Fiddletown," is continued, with his usual strength; there is a story about Baum, the Cornet player; an illustrated Cruise among the Azores; a profusely pictured and very suggestive article on the New York Central Park; a delightful illustrated paper on The Birds of the Poets, by John Burroughs; a curious Study of Japanese Fans, by Noah Brooks; Whitelaw Reid's Commencement Address on The Scholar in Politics; the second of Blauvelt's important papers on Modern Skepticism; a reply to the recent article on The Liberty of Protestantism; a portrait and biography of Edward Eggleston, author of The Hosier School master; and the usual quantity of poetry.

Dr. Holland, the editor, gives us another installment of Arthur Bonnicastle, and the following Topics of the Time—The outlook, the New York Board of Education, Ownership in Women, and the Liberty of Protestantism. The Old Cabinet talks about the people who get under other people's Umbrellas, etc. Home and Society, Culture and Progress, Nature and Science, and Etchings are as usual diversified and interesting.

Scribner's Monthly has increased ten thousand in circulation during the past year.

The first number of Scribner's Child's Magazine, of which the name has not yet been announced, will appear in the fall.

The PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for September must be pronounced by every reader a capital number. It contains over twenty set articles, besides shorter papers; among them being Hiram Powers, with portrait; Extraordinary Scientific Discovery; Living unto Life; Dr. Horatius Bonar, with portrait; Laughter, illustrated; Sketches from Real Life, No. 4, illustrated. Good Behavior—which everybody should read; Prof. J. M. Kieffer, with portrait; Mary Lee's Dream, a story for teachers; Over-training; Curiosities of Abstinence; Local Option, or the Temperance Experiment at Vineland; Dr. Witter's Wit and Wisdom; From Cheboygan to Mackinaw on Ice; The Chinese Wheelbarrow, illustrated; John T. Gordon, a murderer, with portrait, etc. S. R. Wells, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

"Present Truth, or Meat in Due Season," and an Appeal. The first part of this work by Br. Jonas Wendell, has been reprinted entire. It contains the argument on the shorter periods of Daniel and John for the coming of the Lord in 1873. Bound with it is an essay of 6 pages by the writer, "Concerning the End of the World or Age," briefly calling attention to the things and the order of things that are coming to pass in a very little while, and is against the doctrine of "probation" after the Lord comes. It contains 24 pages, —is free to all.

Some, because of past disappointments may be set against definite time and the study of prophecy withall. Suffer me to say to such, Try once more; for this is the last time that the world will be vexed or the church comforted, by a time message in all probability. And will not every one who loves the Lord Jesus and consequently loves his appearing, see that his community is warned? Shall we rest till this is done? To my mind it is the safer position—the argument is good, and cannot be overthrown now. Time alone must do it if ever done.

Trusting God.

Christians might avoid much trouble d inconvenience if they would only lieve what they profess, that God is le to make them happy without any-ing else. They imagine that if such dear friend were to die, or such and ch blessings were removed, they uld be miserable; whereas God can ke them a thousand times happier thout them.

To mention my own case. God has en depriving me of one mercy after other; but as one is removed, he come in and filled up its place.
w, when I am a cripple, and not e to move, I am happier than ever I s in my life before, or ever expected be; and if I had believed this twenty ars ago, I might have been spared ch anxiety. If God had told me e time ago that he was about to ke me as happy as I could be in this rld, and then had told me that he uld begin by crippling me in all my bs, and removing me from my usual rces of enjoyment, I should have ught it a very strange mode of omplishing this purpose. And yet w is his wisdom manifest even in
!—Dr. Payson.

Materialism.

he following article appears in the ent Herald, of July 16th, by J. h:—

"AN OFFER TO MATERIALISTS.

ro. Orrock:—The wonder is often ressed by Materialists that I do see and embrace the doctrine of utter unconscious state of the dead!
relieve their minds, permit me to through the Herald, that it is bese neither Christ nor his apostles
o were the true teachers of Christ-doctrine*) ever taught it. Why should I believe it?

y offer is this: When Materalists produce one text from the New tament which teaches the doctrine, dge myself to accept it. J. Litch."

. S.—Will the materialistic papers this offer an insertion, and thus g it before their readers? J. L.

But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach her gospel unto you than that which we have hed unto you, let him be accursed."
we said before, so say I now again. If any man h any other gospel unto you than that ye have ed, let him be accursed."—Gal. 1; 8, 9.

me might suppose, by the way J. L.
the word "materialists," that such ons are believing in a pernicious damnable doctrine. That he looks in this light is evident, for he ld have his readers believe that were to be accursed. Bro. L.
ves in all the materialism those do m he condemns. The difference ben them is, that in addition to his faith aterialism in common with them, elieves in immaterialism, or Spirit-
m. On the nature of man, he is a tualist. He believes that man has l which survives the death of the and lives in a conscious state, ving more, and more alive, than n in the body; and that the souls icked men at least, do communi-with those who are alive in the ro. L. plainly gives his readers to rstand that those whom he calls terialists," or who are not Spirituin the sense in which he is, are accursed, because they preach her gospel from that preached by

. I thought I had learned from the that to preach the gospel was to ch the glad tidings of the kingdom od. I am not aware that there is difference between Bro. L. and he calls "Materialists" in their s of the kingdom of God. We perfectly agreed in everything per-ng to the kingdom, which comes r the head of glad tidings. Wheth-
he dead are conscious or uncons, it has nothing to do with the tidings of the kingdom. But
L. seems to think, if we do not ve with him that the dead who are asleep, as affirmed in both the Old and New Testaments, are wide awake, and are more alive than when they died, or went to sleer [illegible] preaching another gospel, and [illegible] be accursed. If he m [illegible] passage from Paul to [illegible] se who has differ from him, they ma in turn apply it to him, because he d rs from them. It is said that wh [illegible] e Pope cursed Luther, Luther in turn cursed the Pope. Why not? Which had the better right?

Bro. L. calls upon "Materialists" to produce one passage from the New Testament which plainly teaches that the dead are unconscious. Why did he not include the whole Bible? Why except three-fourths of all the Scriptures, and ask us to find a certain passage in the other fourth? Is it because he thinks that there are some passages in the Old Testament which plainly teach this doctrine? If not, why does he except this part of the Bible? I think that he as firmly believes the Old as he does the New Testament? I have heard him quote Isaiah 9: 20 to correct or explain Paul in Heb. 11: 26. Bro. L. has not given up the Old Testament as a rule of faith. Why, then, does he make this exception in his proposition? Does he think there is a contradition between the Old and New Testaments on this subject which he is not prepared to explain? As he has not told us why he has drawn a line between one part of the word of God and the other part, we of necessity are left to conjecture.

Suppose the man who does not believe in "the second death," as noted in the last book of the Bible, should ask us to find "the second death" named anywhere else in the Bible, saying, if we can, he will believe it. Or, suppose he does not believe that "the New Jerusalem" is to come down from God out of heaven, and asks us to name another passage in the whole Bible which plainly says this? These propositions would be far more reasonable than the one given by Bro. L. For in the one case the man excepts only one book; and in the other he excepts only one verse, and gives us all the rest of the Bible for our work. But Bro. L. has excepted far more than half of the Bible. Why did not Bro. Litch propose to the "Materialists" to find one passage in God's word that plainly teaches the doctrine in dispute? Or, to make it easier for him, why did he not challenge us to find a number of such passages?

It is sometimes proper to answer a question by asking another. I will ask Bro. L. to give us one passage in the Bible which plainly teaches that man, when dead, is more alive than he was before he died; or, that when he falls asleep in death, he is more awake than he was before he went to sleep. Will he give us one passage which plainly teaches that the soul or spirit of man in death can and does hold conversation with men alive in the flesh? Will he refer us to one passage which teaches that man has an "immortal soul," or that he has a soul that can not die? I suppose that Bro. L. believes God's word—"The soul that sinneth, it shall die." And I suppose he believes that the soul is the man, who lives in the body and controls the body for a time, that is to die, and which is more alive after it leaves the body than before. Now will Bro. L. cite us to one passage in the Scriptures which teaches that that soul will be alive when it is dead?

I am not so much surprised that Bro. L. does not believe in what he calls "Materialism" as I am that he uses such arguments as he has in his writings to support his Spiritualism. I hope that his request will be complied with, and that all the papers he refers to will publish his article. J. S. White.

The Old Cabinet talks about the people who get under other people's Umbrellas, etc. Home and Society, Culture and Progress, Nature and Science, and Etchings are as usual diversified and interesting.

Scribner's Monthly has increased ten thousand in circulation during the past year.

The first number of Scribner's Child's Magazine, of which the name has not yet been announced, will appear in the fall.

The Phrenological Journal for September must be pronounced by every reader a capital number. It contains over twenty set articles, besides shorter papers; among them being Hiram Powers, with portrait; Extraordinary Scientific Discovery; Living unto Life; Dr. Horatius Bonar, with portrait; Laughter, illustrated; Sketches from Real Life, No. 4, illustrated. Good Behavior—which everybody should read; Prof. J. M. Kieffer, with portrait; Mary Lee's Dream, a story for teachers; Over-training; Curiosities of Abstinence; Local Option, or the Temperance Experiment at Vineland; Dr. Willier's Wit and Wisdom; From Cheboygan to Mackinaw on Ice; The Chinese Wheelbarrow, illustrated; John T. Gordon, a murderer, with portrait, etc. S. R. Wells, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

"Present Truth, or Meat in Due Season," and an Appeal. The first part of this work by Br. Jonas Wendell, has been reprinted entire. It contains the argument on the shorter periods of Daniel and John for the coming of the Lord in 1873. Bound with it is an essay of 8 pages by the writer, "Concerning the End of the World or Age," briefly calling attention to the things and the order of things that are coming to pass in a very little while, and is against the doctrine of "probation" after the Lord comes. It contains 24 pages, —is free to all.

Some, because of past disappointments may be set against definite time and the study of prophecy withall. Suffer me to say to such, Try once more; for this is the last time that the world will be vexed or the church comforted, by a time message in all probability. And will not every one who loves the Lord Jesus and consequently loves his appearing, see that his community is warned? Shall we rest till this is done? To my mind it is the safer position—the argument is good, and cannot be overthrown now. Time alone must do it if ever done.

Orders for free distribution may be sent to Eld. Jonas Wendell, Edinboro, Pa., or to me at Keyport, N. J.

BRANCH—BOOTH.—By Eld. J. M. Snook, at his home in Jackson, Mich., Aug. 1, Eld. Wm. Branch, of Woodbridge, Hillsdale Co., Mich., to Miss Emily Alvira Booth, of Perry, Shawnee Co., Mich.

Obituary.

MORSE.—Died Aug. 20, 1873, near Yorktown, Bureau Co., Ill., of billious fever, Mrs. Lucinda Morse. Aged 43 years.

She leaves a husband and three children to mourn in deep sadness her sudden death. She had lived a faithful christian life for the past six years, and was highly esteemed by all who knew her. Their home was a resting place for God's children. Her death was calm and peaceful, like her life.

Words of comfort by the writer from Luke 20: 36, and at the grave was sung:

"Sister, thou wast mild and lovely."

May the dear children and their father so live that they may meet where death can never come.

S. B. MABEY.

Oriole please copy.

BLACKBURN.—Killed suddenly, Br. Benj. Blackburn, Aug. 22, by the caving in of a clay bank, under which the brother was digging clay for a brick yard. Aged about 36 years.

Words of comfort by the writer from Rom. 8: 34, 35. We do not mourn as those who have no hope.

HIRAM WILLETT.

MORRISON.—Fell asleep in Jesus, in Chicago, Aug 17, Eliza, wife of Br. Peter Morrison. Aged 60 years.

Sr. M. was confined to her bed fourteen months with an inward cancer. She was a constant sufferer, but bore her pains without a murmer. No one could spend an hour by her bedside and not be benefitted. She was often heard to say, "God will supply all my needs." She was a member of the Baptist church. Her pastor, Dr. Everetts, spoke comforting words upon the occasion. We accompanied the mourners to her last resting place, and by request, sang the hymn:

"Mournfully, tenderly, bear on the dead,
Where Jesus has lain let the christian be lain."

D. R. & M. S. MANSFIELD.

Poetry.

"That Blessed Hope."

E. A. MARSH.

[Tune in "Bright Jewels," p. 16.]

That blessed hope is dear to me,
It cheers me on my journey,
To that bright world where I shall see
The ransomed and the holy;
That blessed hope brings to my view
A golden city nearing,
Where all the saints in earth made new
Are endless praises singing.

That blessed hope my faith inspires,
While passing through temptation;
For now I know my heart's desires
Will have their full fruition.
When Jesus comes on earth to reign,
In all his glory shining,
I then my heavenly home shall gain,
And hear the saints there singing.

That blessed hope brings Jesus near,
And drives away my sadness;
For soon I know he will appear,
And fill my heart with gladness,
When I shall reach that final goal.
The saints his name are praising,
And while the ages ceaseless roll
Redemption's song are singing.

That blessed hope brings endless life—
A full and free salvation
From sin and death and worldly strife,
And through our King redemption.
Oh glorious hope, may we be there
When saints who have been sleeping
Shall rise and palms of victory bear,
There may we join in singing.

The Mortal and the Immortal.

BY REV. HORATIUS BONAR, D. D., of SCOTLAND.

"Neither can they die any more." (Luke 20, 36.)

Ours is a dying world; and immortality has no place upon this earth. That which is deathless is beyond these hills. Mortality is here; immortality is yonder! Mortality is below; immortality is above. "Neither can they die any more," is the prediction of something future, not the announcement of anything either present or past. At every moment one of the sons of Adam passes from this life; and each swing of the pendulum is the death-warrant of some child of time. "Death," "death," is the sound of its dismal vibration. "Death," "death," it says, unceasingly, as it oscillates to and fro. The gate of death stands ever open, as if it had neither locks nor bars. The river of death flows sullenly past our dwellings; and continually we hear the splash and cry of one, and another, and another, as they are flung into the rushing torrent, and carried down to the sea of eternity.

Earth is full of death-beds. The groan of pain is heard everywhere,—in cottage or castle, in prince's palace or peasant's hut. The tear of parting is seen falling everywhere; rich and poor, good and evil, are called to weep over the departure of beloved kindred, husband or wife, or child or friend. Who can bind the strong man that he shall not lay his hand upon us or our beloved ones? Who can say to sickness, Thou shalt not touch my frame; or to pain, Thou shalt not come nigh; or to death, Thou shalt not enter here? Who can light up the dimmed eye, or recolor the faded cheek, or reinvigorate the icy hand, or bid the sealed lip open, or the stiffened tongue speak once more the words of warm affection? Who can enter the death-chamber, and speak the "Talitha Cumi" of resurrection? Who can look into the coffin, and say, Young man, arise? Who can go into the tomb, and say, Lazarus, come forth?

The voice of death is heard everywhere. Not from the bier alone, nor the funeral procession, nor the dark vault, nor the heaving churchyard. Death springs up all around. Each season speaks of death. The drooping spring-blossom; the scorched leaf of summer; the ripe sheaf of autumn; the bare black winter mould,—all tell of death. The wind storm, with its thick clouds and hurrying shadows; the sharp lightning, bent on smiting; the dark torrents, ravaging field and vale; the cold sea-wave; the ebbing tide; the rumbling rock; the up-torn tree,—all speak of dissolution and corruption. Earth numbers its grave-yards by hundreds of thousands; and the sea covers the dust of uncounted millions, who coffined and uncoffined, have gone down into its unknown darkness.

Death reigns over earth and sea; city and village are his. Into every house this last enemy has entered, in spite of man's desperate efforts to keep him out. There is no family without some empty seat or crib; no fireside without a blank; no circle out of which some brightness has not departed. There is no garden without some faded rose; no forest without some sere leaf; no tree without some shattered bough; no harp without some broken string.

In Adam all die. He is the head of death, and we its mortal members. There is no exemption from this necessity; there is no discharge in this war. The old man dies; but the young also; the gray and the golden head are laid in the same cold clay. The sinner dies; so also does the saint: the common earth from which they sprang receives them both. The fool dies; so also does the wise. The poor man dies: so also does the rich. "All flesh is grass."

The first Adam died; so also died the second Adam, who is the Lord from heaven. But there is a difference. The first Adam died, and, therefore, we die. The second Adam died and therefore we live; for the last Adam was made a quickening spirit; and this is the pledge of final victory over death and the tomb. Thus, the grave is the cradle of life; night is the womb of the day; and sunset has become sunrise to our shaded and sorrowful earth. Yet, this is not yet realized. We are still under the reign of death, and this is the hour and the power of darkness. The day of the destruction of death, and the unlocking of sepulchres is not yet. It will come in due time. Meanwhile we have to look on death; for our dwelling is in a world of death,—a land of graves.

If, then, we would get beyond death's circle and shadow, we must look above. Death is here, but life is yonder. Corruption is here, incorruption is yonder. The fading is here, the blooming is yonder. We must take the wings of the morning and fly away to the region of the unsorrowing and the undying; where "that which is sown in weakness shall be raised in power, and death be swallowed up in victory."

It is not that God loves death, or desires to see the extension of its gloomy reign. It was not because he loved it that he let it loose upon the world at first; nor, after so many ages, has he begun to love it now, or become familiar with it, or to look with indifference upon the ills which attend it,—the sorrow, the weeping, the pain, the desolation, the breaking in pieces of the great temple of humanity, and the undoing of all that divine handiwork which at first he pronounced so very good. No. But sin has entered; and law, unchangeable, remorseless, righteous law, demands the execution of the lawful sentence, "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surlly die;" "dust thou art and to dust shalt thou return." Man has only himself to blame for a mortal body and a ruined earth. God hates death, and all that death has done, as truly as he hates sin. He abhors the grave and all its corruption. He did not make man to be the prey of worms, nor create earth to be either a sepulchre or a hell. The eye weeps, yet God did not make it to weep, but to sparkle with gladness; and the lips utter sorrow yet God did not make them to speak aught but praise and joy. So man dies; but God made him not to die, but to live. Earth is a vast grave-yard; yet God made it a paradise of life. His soul loathes the corruption of mortality, with which our world is over-spread. He abhors death, and will, ere long, arise and avenge himself upon it for the ravages of six thousand years. No stronger language of abhorrence could be used, no more solemn purpose of divine vengeance could be indicated than the following:—"I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from mine eyes." (Hos. 13. 14).

We look forward to the day of incorruption; but not so earnestly as God himself. It is on resurrection that his heart is set; and not an hour longer than is absolutely needful shall that glorious consummation be delayed, The Church desires it; this body groans for it; all creation longs for it; but God still more than all. His object is not to perpetuate, but to terminate the reign of death: through death to destroy him that has the power of death. His purpose is to abolish death, to bind Satan, and to give his saints glorified bodies, and introduce the new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. All heaven above is interested in resurrection. It is a thing such as angels have never seen, save in the case of the risen Son of God, the gate of whose rocky sepulchre they descended to open. They long for the resurrection-glory, as truly as they join in the joy over one sinner that repenteth.

Blessed words are these: "Neither can they die any more." It is not simply, Neither shall they die any more, but neither can they die any more. Death, which is now a law, an inevitable necessity, shall then be an impossibility. Blessed impossibility! Neither can they die any more! Oh, the security which these words give! Oh, the comfort, the unutterable gladness which they diffuse through the soul! Neither can they die any more! They who are partakers of the first resurrection of the world to come, are made forever immortal. They live forever. They cannot die. They have put on incorruption. They are clothed with the immortality of the Son of God; for as the Head is immortal, so shall the members be. Ah this is victory over death! This is the triumph of life! It is more than resurrection; for it is resurrection, with the security that death can never again approach them throughout eternity.

All things connected with that new resurrection-state shall be immortal, too. Their inheritance is unfading. Their city, the new Jerusalem, shall never crumble down. Their paradise is as much beyond the power of decay as it is beyond the reach of a second serpent-tempter. Their crowns are all imperishable; and the white raiment in which they shine shall never need cleaning or renewal No failing of eyesight; no wrinkles on their brow; no hollowness in their cheeks; no gray hairs upon their heads; no weariness of limbs; nor languor of spirits; nor drying up of their rivers of pleasure. The evil days shall never come nor the years draw nigh when they shall say, We have no pleasure in them. The keepers of the house shall never tremble nor the strong men bow themselves, nor the grinders cease, nor they who look out of the windows be darkened. No fear shall be in the way, nor shall the almond-tree flourish, nor the the grasshoper become a burden, nor shall desire fail, nor shall the mourners go about the streets. The silver cord shall not be loosed, nor the golden bowl be broken nor the pitcher be broken at the fountain, nor the wheel at the cistern. One generation shall not pass away nor another come. There shall be a time to be born, but not a time to die; a time to plant but no time to pluck up that which is planted; a time to heal, but no time to kill; a time to build, but no time to break down; a time to laugh but no time to weep; a time to dance, but no time to mourn; a time to get, but no time to lose; a time to love, but no time to hate; a time of peace, but no time of war. Never again shall it be said, The days of darkness are coming; for the sun shall no more go down, neither for brightness shall the moon withdraw itself, for the Lord shall be their everlasting light, and the days of their mourning shall be ended. Then shall the wise man's maxim be out of date for ever, "The day of death is better than the day of birth;" and never more shall his lament over a fading world be heard, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." Here they sing.

"Ah! I shall soon be dying,
Time swiftly glides away."

But then their song is only of life, for they know that they cannot die any more. Here they say, as one, feeling his mortality, has plaintively sung,

"Go and dig my grave to-day,
Homeward doth my journey tend;
And I lay my staff away
Here, where all things earthly end;
And I lay my weary head
In the only painless bed."

But there they shall sing, not their deathdirge but their resurrection song, with resurrection-voice, in the glorious resurrection-land, "where they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; but where the Lamb shall lead them to the living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."—(Family Sermons, pp. 416—423)

HAVE you thought how many weak things there are in the world. Look at the natural kingdom. How few are the oaks and many are the rushes! There is a rose with a stem so fragile as almost to break under the burden of its own fragrant bloom; yet God is the God of the reed and the rose.

The Philospher and the Bible.

Jean D. Muller, a learned Swiss writer, was deeply engaged in historical studies at Cassel, in the year 1872. Indefatigable in research, he wrote to his friend, Charles Bonnet, that he had studied all the ancient authors, without one exception, in the order of time in which they lived, and had not omitted to take note of a single remarkable fact. Among other works, it occurred to him to glance at the New Testament, and we give in his own words the impression it produced on him:

"How shall I express what I found here? I had not read it for many years, and when I began it I was prejudiced against it. The light which blinded St. Paul in his journey to Damascus was not more prodigious or more surprising to him than what I suddenly discovered was to me the accomplishment of every hope, the perfection of all philosophy, the explanation of all revolutions the key of all the apparent contradictions of the material and mortal world, of life and immortality. I see the most astonishing things effected by the smallest means. I see the connection of all the revolutions in Europe and Asia with that suffering people to whom were committed the promises, as one like to intrust a manuscript to those who, not knowing how to write, cannot falsify it. I see religion appearing at the moment most favorable to its establishment, and in a way least likely to promote its reception; the world appearing to be arranged solely with reference to the religion of the Savior. I can understand nothing if such a religion be not from God. I have not read any books about it, but in studying all that happened before this epoch, I have always found something wanting, and since I have known our Lord all is clear to my sight: with him there is no problem I cannot solve. Forgive me for thus praising the sun, as a blind man who had suddenly received the gift of sight."

The Great Wonders.

An anecdote is told of a poor North American Indian, who returned to the backwoods of his distant tribe to recount the wonders he had witnessed at Washington. They were witnessed to with doubt and incredulity, until he declared he had seen the white people attach a great ball to a canoe, and so rasie into the clouds and travel through the heavens. This was instantly pronounced to be an impossibility, and a young warrior, in a paroxysm of anger, leveled a rifle at his head, and shot him dead on the spot, as too great a liar to be permitted too live. If, then, what takes place in another climate, or in a different state of society, appears absurd because contrary to experience, shall we greatly wonder that the things of the Spirit of God—those heavenly and eternal things which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man"—should be foolishness to all who have not the Spirit, and are consequently alienated from the life of God?—Haldane.

The Russian Empire.

W. J. MILLIKEN.

Never since the great Napoleon have the politics of Europe assumed a more threatening aspect than at present; and never have the nations of that mighty continent been more convulsed with real and apprehended danger.

France, humbled to the very dust before victorious Prussia, Prussia vaulting from the position of a third-rate power into the highest seat of military glory, Spain assuming the principles of freedom amid the throes of revolution, and Russia shaking off the restrictions which jealous treaties have heretofore imposed and absorbing new provinces in the valley of the Oxus preparatory to a march sooner or later to Constantinople; all proclaim the presence of prodigious events, and foreshadow the coming of still greater catastrophies. The dissolution of the Treaty of Paris effected by Russia a few months ago, and the more recent absorption of Khiva in the valley of the Oxus, are initial steps in the execution of a plan which aims at the absorption of a continent.

The ambition of Russia is boundless. Not content with an empire stretching from the Black Sea to the Baltic, and from the Baltic on through northern Asia to the Pacific, she is still ambitious of extending her dominions, and and the shadow of this ambition falls ominously across Europe, and darkens all Asia. She dreams of a mighty empire which shall claim oceans for its harbors and continents for its provinces. The plan which has long filled the outline of her imperial policy is to seize Constantinople, cross the Bosphorus, conquer Persia, and passing the borders of the Afghanistan dispute with England for the possession of India. Her southern limits thus extended from the Bosphorus to the Ganges, the dominion of the continent becomes inevitable and thus Asia is annexed as a footblock to the throne of her empire.

The memories of the Crimea, then are not obliterated.

England will yet feel in the robbery of her most flourishing provinces, the vengeance of that ambition which neither the diplomacy of statesmen nor the arms of consolidated soldiers can foil or conquer.

Nor does this plan involve simply territorial acquisition; it grasps at the greatest commercial advantages. Hitherto the commerce of England, France, Spain, and nearly all Europe with India and China has been subjected to slow and distant voyages around the Cape of Good Hope and the Indian ocean. But since the opening of the Suez canal, a far more rapid and easy passage is found through the waters of the Mediterranean and the Red sea. But give Russia Constantinople and Russian keels will soon guard the Straits of Gibraltar and the ports of Rosetta.

Constantinople controls the Dardanells and this passage to the Mediterranean once secured Russian fleets or policy would soon spread Russian mastery over all the Mediterranean. Thus fetter this important sea and the commerce and bread markets of all southern Europe lie at the mercy of Russia. Thus Spain, France, Italy, Turkey and Greece would be compelled to pay tribute to an empire as much dreaded as its ambition is aspiring. Truly "Constantinople is the key to the world," as Napoleon said at St. Helena. It was the fear of this plan that disturbed that illustrious warrior, and the fear of it to-day makes Europe tremble. Had Russia less power the specter would seem less huge and formidable; but powerful as she is in numbers and resources, the apprehensions of Europe are well grounded. The only obstacle which has hitherto prevented the consummation of the scheme has been the Turkish empire, backed by the consolidated powers of Europe, and the maintenance of her territory unimpaired is the only impediment which can prevent it now.

For the preservation of Turkey the recources of Europe must be pledged. Turkey herself can offer no successful resistence to Russia. For a long time her power has been waning, and nothing has kept her in existence but the jealousies of other nations, fearful of ambitious Russia. As soon as these nations cease to come to the rescue, the doom of Turkey and of the dominion of the Mediterranean is sealed. Let the fleet of Russia once start for Constantinople unimpeded by rival nations, and the Turkish empire will be trampled into powder. It is true the valor of the Turks is historic, but valor alone cannot accomplish all things. It may be heroic and desperate, but without material recources it is powerless. But while the valor of Rome is at a discount her recourses are well nigh illimitable. The largest and best accoutered army, a rapidly increasing navy, and the most unmeasured means when developed of any nation in Europe await her imperial nod to convert plan into execution and ambition into conquest.

But it may be urged if the plans of Russia are so formidable, why did she submit the Black sea question to a congress of powers? Why did she not improve her opportunity when France and Prussia were grappling, and each was straining every nerve for mastery? Then if ever, it may be thought, her ambition could have been realized, for two of the most formidable nations of Europe were so disposed that, if they could not be her friends at least they could not well become her enemies. And when the number and power of her adversaries were thus reduced and weakened why did she not strike if she has intended to strike at all? Dear as this scheme is to Russia it may well be supposed that she is too discrete if not too humane to unnecessarily forfeit the sympathies of all Christendom by setting Europe at defiance and plunging headlong into aggressive war. "Peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must," is doubtless the policy of the Russian Czar. The submission of the Black sea question to a congress of powers was a master stroke of policy. No one can look at the position of Russia on the map with a knowledge of her population, commerce and resources, without instantly perceiving the vital necessity of unrestrained outlet to the Mediterranean. Nearly three fourths of the commerce of that great nation must be shipped by sea, and the Baltic, the only sea over which she has free control is open to navigation but little more than one half the year. Hence the necessity of an outlet through the Dardinells which admits of constant commercial advantages. Russia has a large coast too on the Black sea. But by the treaty of Paris her right to coast defence was grievously restricted. She was denied the right of maintaining in the Euxine a fleet of sufficient strength to protect her coast in case of "invasion." With this restriction, literally binding her in the south to the Dardanells in a military as well as a commercial point of view, became to her precisely what the lower Mississippi in the hands of a foreign power would become to the United States. Had Louisiana never been purchased from France, or had the Southern States succeeded in establishing a separate confederacy the parallel between the Northern States and the Mississippi, and Russia and the Dardanells, both in respect to self defense and commerce would be perfect. As long as Russia was denied the right of maintaining in the Euxine a navy sufficient to insure her safety, any European nation that might league with Turkey could at any moment sail up the Dardanells with hostile navies, sink the Russian fleet almost at a broadside and ravage her defenseless coast. Thus her most easily assailed parts were exposed to the assaults of foreign enemies.

What nation would thus suffer its commerce to be subjected to the caprices of a foreign power, or would mildly permit its most easily assailed points to be in the hands of a hostile nation? The demands of Russia in this respect were not only wise but just, and it was to call the attention of the nations to these facts and to press home upon them the justness of these demands that this submission was resorted to. No policy could have been wiser, or more effective in riveting the sympathies of enlightened nations to her cause. Russia was well aware that if her demands were refused and war was invoked, that intrinsic justice would go far to shield her from the censure of the world. If they were acceded to she was one step nearer the consummation of her plans. In either case therefore the policy pursued would be beneficial to Russia and injurious only to her foes. But aside from these considerations, Russia is not yet ready for such a war. However strong her military armaments may be upon land, however rapidly her navy and other elements of strength may be rising into power she is not yet ready for the threatened blow. The contest when begun will not be confined to land and the strife of armies. The sea will reel beneath the shock of navies, and her white foam redden at the broadsides of their squadrons. To-day the combined fleets of England, France, Austria and Turkey, could sweep the Russian banner from the seas. To oppose the navies of her adversaries with her present naval strength would be to court irretrievable disaster. She would only repeat the history of the French at Trafalgar, or the Turks at Navarino. But as soon as the fleet of the Baltic shall be strong enough to protect the coasts of Russia that lie along the sea, (a consummation not impossible nor distant), and the fleet of the Euxine has grown to equal power, we may then believe that decisive time has come. And it may be notwithstanding these seeming impediments sooner than this, England will hear the tread of her embattled legions in India.

Slowly but surely the work of Russian absorption goes on east and south-east of the Caspian. The clutch of Russia is already upon Khiva. Nearer and nearer the Russian eagles approach the the lines of Afghanistan and Beloachistan, which will soon be the only barrier on the west between Russia and India. With equal slowness but with equal certainty the borders of the Russian empire in Asia enlarge toward China and Hindoostan from the north. Thus gradually the circle of Russian authority widens in Asia as tribes and clans of semi-barbarous people with their little states are absorbed by the great empire. These absorptions justly excite the fears of European nations, for they well know they bring the hour of Russian supremacy nearer and nearer to their doors. It may be to that the annexation of Khiva and the provinces around the Caspian which so lately started England to her feet ready to unsheathe the sword has for its real object the crumbling of Turkish authority in Asia by surrounding it on every side by Russian territory and Russian influence. If Russia could lop off Turkey in Asia from the Turkish empire and leave only Turkey in Europe subject to the Sultan, Turkish authority would then confined to the western shores of the Bosphorus while Russia would control the eastern shores and virtually the Dardanells, thus strengthened, the foothold of Russia in Europe as well as in Asia would be well nigh immovable.

But it may well be supposed that Russia will never be allowed to absorb provinces along the Bosphorus through the artful policy of surrounding Turkish power in Asia without a desperate struggle, but that such a struggle is approaching is undoubtable. To calculate the relations of the probable combattants or the chances of defeat or victory would be a matter of uncertain speculation. The sympathies of Prussia however would doubtless be with Russia, while the rest of Europe would consolidate against her. But whatever relations the crisis may necessitate, the world awaits with eager interest the solution of the question of Russian supremacy in the Mediterranean and Asia.—Penn. School Journal.

Christian Strength.

FRANK BURR.

"Be strong in the Lord." This is the inspired command. And it means just what reads—"be strong." Strength does not mean weakness. The weak ones are exhorted to become strong, and the strong ones to remain strong. It is a positive condition in which all are to be strong, while some may be stronger than others, and one is the strongest of all, even Jesus. It is not strength in muscles, or bone, or will, but in the Lord. The Lord's strength may be in us, but our strength must be in the Lord. Thus Sampson was strong in God, and God was strong in him to kill the Philistines. David was strong in God, and God was strong in him to slay Goliath. We seek the Lord's strength and the Lord uses us. We go before the Lord, and he anoints us with his strength, and clothes us with his armor.

"Be strong," for a warfare is commenced and you are to fight. The foe has been cast out of you, and he will seek an entrance again. The struggle is outside now. It was an inward struggle before you were cleansed. Then you were weak indeed and were easily overcome, but with God's spirit within there is strength.

Satan is not to be kept in a partially subdued state within, but to be wholly cast out. Thus only can you be strong. The tempter will seek to return and abide in you again. But if you are strong in the Lord he will find no entrance. No matter how weak you may be in yourself, strength in Jesus assures you the victory.

"Be strong." How strong? Strong enough to overcome. That is all that is necessary. If the temptation is a weak one, then just strength enough to overcome is all you need. If it is a strong one, then strength to overcome is what you need. And the promise is, "as thy day is so shall thy strength be." Men do not drive shingle nails with sledges. Neither do they bind wagon-tires with tack-hammers. Even so the christian needs the power of God in just force enough so that when he strikes he can win in a right way. Be just as strong as the Lord would have you, and no stronger. Dont try to be as strong as Br. A or Sr. B, but be content with strength enough to do your own work, and be not content short of this.

"Be strong." Exercise gives strength. Those who neither labor or discipline themselves are not strong. They cannot endure hardship. So those who do not work for Jesus soon become weak. They cannot endure but give way to the tempter. And then they bemoan their sins, and excuse themselves because of their weakness. They are so easily overcome. No wonder. Rejecting the very means put into their hands to overcome sin, and neglecting to exercise themselves in godliness, they are not strong and cannot expect to be overcomers. Such need to fill up with the element of the Holy Spirit, and then their languor and indifference will pass away, and they will exercise themselves in holy work, and the tempter will no more overcome them than he did Jesus in the wilderness.

Why not be strong? Does any one love to be weak? Is the experience of sin pleasant? Then the heart is not right and the whole work must be commenced anew. But if the weakness is deplored, then there is no reason why we should retain it. We can be strong if we only will. Did Jesus ever fail? And if we will come to him will he not impart to us strength? Surely he will "supply all our need." Then let us no longer cry out because we are so weak, but let us seek strength and use it.

"Triumphant zion lift thy head
From dust and darkness and the dead."

"Be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." Stand firm. Beat back the foe. Rout the enemy. Storm the fortress and overcome, for stronger is he that is in you than he that is in the world. And to Jesus be all the glory of the mighty victory, and be it ours to join with him in all the fruits of peace in the everlasting kingdom.

Lambs and Sheep.

H. WILLETT.

"So when they had dined, Jesus said to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these. He saith unto him, yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, feed my lambs. He saith to him again the second time, Simon son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, feed my sheep. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things: thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, feed my sheep."–(John 21: 15-17.)

The "good shepherd" used words and illustrations with which the common people were familiar, hence they heard him gladly. Men, however, generally say sheep and lambs, instead of lambs and sheep, in speaking of a flock, I suppose from an idea of the greater importance or worth of the full grown sheep than the lamb, but not so spoke the great shepherd. The lambs seem to be the first objects of his concern; "feed my lambs." We may suppose because they are more feeble than the sheep; and also, perhaps, that in order to become sheep they must first be lambs, which precludes the idea that a sheep ever can grow up from anything else than a lamb: "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven."–(Mat. 18: 3.)

A kid will grow up a goat, a pup a dog, a cub a bear, and a whelp a lion. This is the law of nature which we all acknowledge. The Savior, however, warns us that there will be efforts made to set aside this law, as follows: "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves," (Matt. 7), and then illustrates the impossibility of a wolf being a sheep at the same time, indeed and in truth, while he is a wolf, although having on the outside garb of sheep, by the impossibility to gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles; but the law of nature is such that a good tree brings forth good fruit, and a corrupt tree evil fruit: "Wherefore by their fruits he shall know them."

In the 10th of John it is recorded that Jesus spoke a parable, in which is a description of a good shepherd, and also several other things mentioned, as sheep-fold, the door of the same, the porter; also, thieves and robbers, a strange shepherd or hireling, the nature of sheep, the desire of the wolf, and the result of employing an hireling that careth not for the sheep; he then explains the import of the parable to be that he was the door; all others that represented themselves to be doors were thieves and robbers, as he only is the "life and the way;" and the result of entering in by him was salvation, to the sheep: that is to go in and &c.

We find also that Paul speaks of th flock, wolves, &c., in giving his char to the elders of the church of Ephes (Acts 20), as follows: "Take hee therefore unto yourselves and to th flock, over which the Holy Ghost hat made you overseers, to feed the churc of God, which he hath purchased wit his own blood. For I know this, tha after my departure shall grievou wolves enter in among you, not spa ing the flock. Also of your own selve shall men arise, speaking pervers things, to draw away disciples afte them."

But to return to the charge of ou Savior to Peter: "Feed my lamb feed my sheep." Yes the good shep hard had been smitten, and the shee scattered, as the prophet foretold, y they were not lost: Oh no, the goo shepherd had given his life for th sheep. He layed it down that h might take it again.

But now for a while to overseer servants, laborers in the vineyar disciples, undershepherds, teacher preachers, deacons, elders, bishop watchmen and others, as brethern an sisters of the Lord, is committed th charge, "feed the flock." And now w understand the Savior in addressin Peter, who seemed so prominent character, the one who professed t love him so much as to say, "Thoug all men shall be offended because thee, yet will I never be offended, and "I will lay down my life for th sake." Now, Peter, establish you good profession by good works. An does not the requirement reach to al Peters, to all who should profess fideli ty and love in so strong terms and s repeatedly, to remember the dea Savior's request, "feed the lambs; fee the sheep," as a good way to manifes this love?

Yes, Peter, you can show your lov now more fully than you did hereto fore perhaps by words, because, sad t tell you, you also denied him thrice b word; but now he is going away for while, in order to secure a better plac for you and all the flock, where ther will be no more sorrow, death, pain, o separation.

You profess again thrice to love me now manifest that love by administer ing to the lambs and the sheep. They are mine, Peter, as well as you are. have bought them with a price, eve with my own life's blood: and I hav told you about the dangers in thi world, the wolves, thieves, robber and mere hirelings that care not fo the sheep; now prove yourself a faith ful watchman. Peter was bold for hi master thenceforth. He fed the flock. He has left on record precious word of comfort to all the followers o Jesus.

But again, the Savior's request t Peter. Does not the charge come t all who profess to love Jesus, to som extent at least, or in some relation o life? Peter was a representative man as well as were the other apostles, o christians coming after them, in th christian dispensation; and the princi ple is good to the end that faith is mad perfect by works. Surely we can man ifest love best by works. No lambs t feed? no sheep to feed? Look aroun you brother, sister. No children t nurture and admonish in the Lord? I there not a neighbor to save, or dea one to admonish, or even a stranger t take in? Perhaps they are the Lord' chosen ones. Who knoweth but al these may be the true sheep at last washed in the blood of the lamb, mad white and purified, through your lead ing, watching, prayer, and admonition Let us be faithful a little while longer so that, as Peter says, (1 Peter 5:4) "When the chief shepherd shall ap pear, ye shall receive a crown of glory possessed a value beyond the wealth of kingdoms; the world was now a passing vanishing shadow, and man's days on earth had been cut down from three score and ten to the twinkling of an eye. O how they preached! No polished periods, no learned arguments, no labored paragraphs chilled their appeals, or rendered their discourses unintelligible. No fear of man, no love of popular appeals, no overscrupulous dread of strong expressions, no fear of excitement or enthusiasm, prevented them from pouring out the whole fervor of their hearts, that yearned with tenderness unutterable over dying souls. "Old time," says Vincent, "seemed to stand at the head of the pulpit, with his great scythe, saying with a hoarse voice, 'Work while it is called to-day, at night I will mow thee down.'" Grim death seemed to stand at the side of the pulpit with his sharp arrows, saying, Do thou shoot God's arrows, and I will shoot mine. The grave seemed to lie open at the foot of the pulpit, with dust in her bosom, saying,

Louden the cry
To God,
To men
And now fulfill thy trust;
Here thou must lie,
Mouth stopped,
Breath gone,
And silent in the dust.

Ministers had now awakening calls to seriousness and fervor in their ministerial work, to preach on the side and brink of the pit into which thousands were tumbling. Now there is such a vast concourse of people in the churches where these ministers are to be found, that they cannot many times come and in the world to come eternal life." Evidently, it is in the age to come that we become possessors of eternal life. In 1 John 2, 25; "And this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life." A promise denotes something future. John 12. 25: "And he that looseth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." If Timothy had eternal life literally, whilst living, why did Paul exhort him to lay hold of it? (Jude, ver. 21:) "Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." Matt. 25. 46: "But the righteous into life eternal." If we are not yet possessors of that future life, in a literal sense, thanks be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord, we have the earnest of it, and are persuaded that he is able to keep that which we have committed unto him against that day.—I remain, yours very truly,

S. Tattersall, in Rainbow.

Giving Heartily to God.

It is related of Andrew Fuller that, on a begging tour, for the cause of missions, he called on a certain wealthy nobleman to whom he was unknown, but who had heard much of Fuller's talents and piety. After he had stated to him the object of his visit, his lordship observed that he thought he should make him no donation. Dr. Fuller was preparing to return, when the nobleman remarked that there was one man to whom, if he could see him, he would give something for the mission, and that man was Andrew Fuller. Mr. Fuller immediately replied, "My name, sir, is Andrew Fuller." On this the nobleman, with some hesitation, gave him a guinea. Observing the indifference of the donor, Mr. Fuller looked him in the face with much gravity, and said, "Does this donation sir, come from the heart? If it does not, I wish not to receive it." The nobleman was melted and overcome with his honest frankness, and, taking from his purse ten guineas more, said "There, sir, these come from my heart." Men should give to the cause of missions cheerfully. They should do good with a good motive. "The Lord loves a cheerful giver."

Why Should We Care?.

When the Lord called in the care, and anxiety, and desire of his people from the kingdom of the present world, as wholly unworthy of their pursuit, he did not leave them without another kingdom, on which these affections might be worthily employed, which he nameth the kingdom of heaven—that is, the kingdom to come, whereof we are heirs, and to the inheritance of which we shall be raised up to enter along with our risen Lord. This kingdom we cannot presently possess, save in faith and hope, because it is yet future. And for this inheritance it is is that we continue strangers and pilgrims in the present evil world, patiently looking for a city whose builder and whose maker is God. And why should I, who am promised the inheritance of of the earth, strive for one of its fields, or care for one of its clayey mansions? And why should I, who shall see God, and see him as he is—no despised man in weeds of sorrow, but a King in his beauty—care for the fear and favor of the great ones and beautiful ones of the earth? And shall I, who am the son of the King of kings, and heir-apparent to a crown of glory, to "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away," care for worldly distinctions or courtly preferments, or aught appertaining to the rebel and corrupt vice-sovereignties of the earth? Thus it is the believer, embodying to to himself that future reign of glory which awaiteth him, seeketh earnestly to be possessed of it in the good time and pleasure of the Lord, and in the faith thereof is content to pass all unnoticed, all despised and trodden on, through the valley of humanity and sorrow, which his Lord walked in before him. One present possession only he desireth—the righteousness of that kingdom, which is its earnest, and the seal of admission to its glory.—Edward Irving.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, September 9, 1873.

Board Meeting.

The members of the Board of the W. A. C. Publishing Society are hereby notified that a meeting of the Board will be held on the 16th day of Sept., 1873, at the office, No. 25 West Lake street, Chicago. The object of said meeting is to either cancel its debts in full, or to lease the property to a party or parties (if they can be found in whom the board has confidence), who will publish the A. C. TIMES in harmony with the requirements of the lease, and assume the debts.

D. MATHEWSON, President.

H. L. HASTINGS and C. C. Marston will attend the Iowa camp meeting.

WE hear good news from the Springfield camp meeting, but too late for insertion this week.

WILL our numerous readers to whom we recently sent blank pledges to be filled out, please look at the list this week, and make haste to imitate the example set?

WE learn that Bro. Grant and Couch were elected as joint editors of the Crisis at their late Society meeting. They are both true men, and will work together in harmony.

THE Wyanet meeting is among the things that were. We have not time to speak of it in this issue further than to say there were some good features about the meeting, and much good preaching by Brn. Hastings, Seymour, and others.

ELD. D. S. CLARK will begin a meeting at West Point, Ill., this week. After finishing this he will begin another at Springfield, and thus continue to "do the work of an evangelist," where doors may open in Ill. or Wis. He will do good wherever he goes.

WE trust that our kind friends will bear with us if business matters are delayed somewhat. It is camp meeting time and our Business Agent is absent from the office, at work for the cause elsewhere. Also the Mailing Clerk is sick, in consequence of which the list will have to go uncorrected this week. All will be made right soon.

OVER eight hundred dollars in pledges came in this week. The people are waking up nobly to their interests. It is truly encouraging, but yet there is room: the debt is not quite covered. Next week the Board will meet. The time to work is short, and may the few days that intervene tell the story that the Advent people are determined to save their cause. We believe they will do it.

SPECIMEN PAGES of the Little Christian will be found on another page of this paper. It is published monthly by Br. H. L. Hastings, 30 Hanover street, Boston, for the benefit of children, and is deserving of patronage. Though once stopped in its mission by the mandate of fire, it has re-entered the field in an enlarged form. As the Little Christian has passed through its fiery trial, and survives to bless the little folks, we trust many will signify their willingness to receive its benediction, by subscribing for it.

ON OUR way to the Wyanet camp meeting we spent a day with Dr. A. Spaulding, Electropathic Physician, Aurora, Ill., and enjoyed a meeting with the few brethren who meet once a week at the Dr.'s residence for worship. The Dr. still treats all disabled Adventist preachers free of charge. The Dr. treats all nervous, chronic, liver and female diseases, goitres, ovarian cancers, uterine cancers, by means of galvanism and electricity in their various forms, with all the latest discoveries and the most improved appa[illegible]

AN "occasional reader" of THE TIMES writes:

> The man that you sent the blank pledge to is too poor to give you anything; but I send you my pledge for five dollars. Although I am no church-man, and think most denominations are mere humbugs, especially the orthodox, yet the cause of Christ, and your cause too, I love. Your interpretation of the word of God I believe is the correct one.

Many other sympathisers might be induced to help, even if they do not take the paper, if the matter were brought to their attention.

THE Chicago Journal says: Several complaints have lately reached us about publishing "so many horrible murders." All we can say is that the Journal is a newspaper, and that, as such, it must publish the actual news of the day. The Lord knows that if we could stop all murders and other great crimes, there would be no more of them; but when such events occur, as they do now-a-days with alarming frequency, we must, as a faithful chronicler of the times, publish them. It does seem as if we had fallen upon the very era of bloody horrors, and we are not less puzzled than are the rest of the world to explain why it is.

The Coming One.

For successive centuries the return of Christ has been earnestly looked for and desired; and even in this time of moral declension, some are found who long for the advent of the coming one, and who also believe it comparatively near, though not in sympathy with the hitherto unsuccessful efforts to make an application of prophetic measurements. Among this class we find Mrs. Palmer, who thus speaks upon this point in her paper called Guide to Holiness:

> We are not now, neither were ever, in sympathy with those who would set the day and hour of our Lord's appearing. But for about thirty years we have unwaveringly believed that, in the most emphatic sense, "the end of all things is at hand"
> This belief has not been founded on the opinions of men, but by much prayerful searching of the Scriptures, comparing scripture with scripture. Believing that all Scripture is given by inpiration, and is profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness, and that the same Spirit that indited the Holy Scripture is given to open its sacred meaning to the humble believer.
> To expect to know the day and hour, or even the year, of the coming of Jesus in the clouds of heaven, we have never thought to be within the province of other than the great Eternal. But that the humble Bible student may, by a careful reliance on the teachings of the word, and observance of the signs of the times, know when the coming of the Lord draweth nigh, and is even at the very doors, is a truth too palpable to require comment.—(See Matt. 24: 29-33.)
> Dear reader, are you in search after truth in regard to the second advent of our Lord? That he will come again you know, because there is not a more explicit, incontrovertible declaration within the lids of the Bible than this.
> Why should not Christians of the present day be like the Christians of nearly two thousand years since? So greatly did the Christians of Thessalonica long for the speedy coming of their Lord that, instead of putting it off "thousands on thousands of years hence" (as did a teacher in Israel with whom we were conversing), their almost impatient desires inclined them to think that it must be immediate. Paul corrects their mistake, telling them that day shall not come until certain things (of which we shall hereafter speak) occur. James also exhorts his suffering brethren to patience, not by telling them that the coming of their Lord was to be protracted "thousands on thousands of ages," but by the most welcome truth, "for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."
> If the joyous anticipations of the return of the son of man should so fill the minds' vision of the early church about two thousand years ago, how should the vision of believers of the present day be occupied with the subject. Christians of the present day have the Old and New Testament Scriptures. The volume of Revelation is closed. The Book of books is in the hand of every believer. Not only does it testify of Christ as a redeemer from sin, but of Christ as a coming one. Oh! yes; with what certainty do the Scriptures tell us of Jesus' coming again, not an offering for sin!
> That has been done. How emphatically does Paul speak of him who was "once offered to bear the sins of many;" and then adds: Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."
> And Titus, also, pointing the eye of his brethren upward, says: "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ."

Can Men See God.

ED. TIMES:—What are we to understand from the following scriptures?

"And I will take away my hand, and thou shalt see my back parts."-Ex. (33:23.)

"And the Lord spake to Moses face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend."-(Ex. 33:11.)

"For I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved."-(Gen. 32:30.)

"No man has seen God at any time."-(John 1:18.)

"Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape."-John 5:37.)

"And he said thou canst not see my face for there shall no man see me and live."-(Ex. 23:20.)

"Whom no man hath seen, nor can see.-(1 Tim. 6:17.)

I do not believe that the above scriptures are a contradiction, but cannot harmonize them. Will you give us an explanation of the foregoing texts through the columns of THE TIMES.

J. A. NICHOLSON.

Stewartsville, Missouri.

No man has seen God with natural vision unaided by miraculous interposition; and no man could thus behold him and live. This fact is not in conflict with the truth that some men have miraculously been endowed with supernatural vision on certain occasions, and thus been enabled to see God as the result of a miracle—not, however, in his glory, as mortality could not endure the sight. A double miracle enabled Moses and others to see God.

1. A miracle on the part of Deity to conceal his own glory, which mortality cannot gaze upon and live.

2. A miracle to give supernatural sight to men, without which they could not see "the invisible God," even after he had disrobed himself of his glory.

No man, without such a miraculous interposition, has ever seen God. All the science that men can bring to their aid will not enable them to see God; but in due time, by a divine miracle, "the pure in heart" of all ages "shall see God," when made equal to the angels, as really as angels now see him; and Jesus said, they "do always behold the face of my father which is in heaven."

Eternal Life of the Soul.

The following statement is used as proof of the endless life of the soul: "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."-(John 17:3.)

1. If the soul is naturally immortal, it has eternal life without knowing God or his son.

2. If the knowledge of God brings present immortality, what becomes of it when men backslide? Are they then immortal sinners, while unconverted men are simply mortal sinners?

3. This knowledge of the Lord is eternal life in the sense of securing it: "This is the promise which he hath promised us, even eternal life." Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life." The physical man will have this life.

Sickly Christians.

They are increasing all over the land. They have a name to live, but lack the vigorous life that springs from the divine spirit. An exchange thus portrays them:

> "They believe feebly, love faintly, act irresolutely, feel the calls of duty lightly, pray coldly, pay stingily, are discouraged easily, indulge self greedily, sacrifice reluctantly, and love the praise of man more than the smiles of God. They read stories more than the Bible, spend more on base appetites than on religious culture, decline to take a religious paper, and pay as little as possible for preaching. They certainly have not religion enough to change their characters in this life, or fit them for the life to come. They need a more thorough conversion, that will renew their hearts, correct their lives, open their pockets, create a thirst for knowledge, and a disposition to do and bear for Jesus' sake."

Lo! The Poor Indian.

An exchange says:

The report of the Commissioners of Indian Affairs for 1872 makes the following estimates of the numbers of Indians in these several States and Territories, viz:

California	22,000
Oregon	12,000
Washington Territory	13,000
Idaho	5,800
Montana	33,412
Utah	11,300
Total	97,512

These figures, compared with those of a half century in the past, are very suggestive. The red men, for some reason, fade away before the "pale faces," and would soon be extinct if time were to last.

To Prevent a Wrong Impression.

The readers of THE TIMES may remember that during the months of May and June last, when I was acting editor of the paper, that S. B. Goodenow, a Congregationalist minister, wrote several articles to prove the continued existence of the soul after death, to which some notes were appended in reply. His last article I returned to him unpublished from the fact that it was leading to a protracted controversy which I felt satisfied would be distasteful to our general readers. I make this statement in justice to Br. Goodenow, that the readers of THE TIMES may not "be left to the impression that he had reached his rope's end, and had nothing more to say," for such would be very far from the truth. The controversy was closed wholly on my part; not on his.

L. C. COLLINS.

Safeguards.

A. N. SEYMOUR.

The combined forces of satanic agencies are cut loose in these days, and are making rapid strides, and meeting with much encouragement and success everywhere; and demoralizing influences are confronting us at every step we take: and while such is the fact, duty to God, to the church, and to ourselves positively demand that every lover of virtue and of our holy religion should throw around them every proper safeguard within their reach. And I know of no better or more reliable safeguards than those that are to be found in the precious Bible. There is a claim put forth by modern spiritists that the Bible does not contain the highest standard of morals in the world; that there is something higher, more noble, and dignified; but I fail to find in all spiritists' philosophy any thing that can begin to compare with the moral instruction found in the holy oracles of God. If spiritists have a moral influence among them calculated to reform society, it very forcibly manifests itself in their daily deportment, especially among their leaders. Paul says that "in the last days wicked men and seducers will wax worse and worse deceiving and being deceived." The errors, deceptions, delusions, and influences that beset the church of Christ are truly multitudinous; and they need much watchfulness and prayer lest their feet be caught in some trap destructive to their faith and hope. The most potent safeguard to be recognised in the scriptures is the Royal Law. Its demands are perfectly legitimate, honorable and dignified; and the fruit that it bears is truly blessed, and glorious beyond description. "Hear what the spirit saith to the churches:" "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment. And the second is like it, namely this: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "There is none other commandments greater than these." Where the first part of this "Royal Law" is duly and divinely considered, and strictly observed, the heart is ever overflowing with love and good will to God, and under no circumstances are such hearts found in open rebellion to God's government or casting an unsavory influence against the spotless character of its author. So while the heart, soul, mind, and strength, are thus sanctified and consecrated to God—his word, his ways, his righteous deportment, and influence, this No. 1 safeguard is a most powerful preservative from foreign destructive elements. Paul says, "There are Lord's many and God's many; but to us there is but one God," &c. No gods of human ingenuity can attract, lead, influence or mould the people whose God is the Lord, the living God; for so long as their will is all submerged in his will, God's omniscient eye is upon them his omnipotent arm around them his infinite love and goodness ever stands ready to protect them in every case of emergency and danger. So all such confiding children are safe. Oh may all hearts bcome thus wedded, and the stream run clear. Could this be so, what a change there would be for the better. Instead of war, religious and political, there would be abundant peace in all these borders. Instead of worshipping heathen deities and many other objects, there would be only the worship of the true and living God. Instead of seeking for the honors and emoluments of a world cursed by sin, all would be seeking true wisdom, and honor that cometh from God only. Instead of laboring for the meat that perisheth, they would be laboring for the meat that endureth unto eternal life. Instead of a volley of oaths and blasphemies flowing out of the mouths of the rebellious, there would be perpetual praise and hallalujahs to God and the Lamb. Instead of sin, unrighteousness, and a world filled with misjudgment and misrule, there would be righteousness, happiness, and just judgment and rule throughout earth's vast dominions. Is not then this first safeguard a "royal" one? If so, and I can't see how any one can doubt it, let us come, one and all, to the point of perfect loyalty, as touching it.

The second part of this "Royal Law," when complied with according to the letter and spirit, would produce universal love and harmony (for all are neighbors). The good fruit dropping from the observance of this commandment cannot be measured in one measure, or even four score; neither can it be told in one book, or even five hundred. "Love thy neighbor as thy self." Oh think of it seriously, weigh it impartially, walk by it faithfully, for by it you demonstrate your loyalty to its author, and love and good will to the great brotherhood of humanity. This "Royal Law" is God's wisdom and counsel to an intelligent race of probationers. It highly commends itself to the best judgment of all men. Its righteousness no man can deny. Its value all men must acknowledge. Its glory, beauty, and practical utility stands out before all men, and demands their loyal support. Will you do it? and, will not these two primary safeguards be invaluable to you while waiting, watching, and expecting the consummation of "that blessed hope?" And more than this, dear reader: Is it not a matter of unspeakable joy and satisfaction in this life to know by blessed experience that the "Royal Law" is the umpire or law of our being, and that we willingly and joyfully accept its jurisdiction over us in all of its original signification, simplicity, and power? Would all men bow to the supremacy of this law, what a vast ocean of wrong, wickedness, corruption, and unhappiness would be at once dismissed from this sinful world; and what an ocean of blessed satisfaction and peace would at once flow to the race. To this law all must willingly yield, and cheerfully comply with its precepts, would they enjoy the peace and joy that dwells in the bosom of the Father, and would they receive at the personal coming of our Lord Jesus Christ the everlasting rest that remaineth for the people of God, very soon to be realized.

Let all bear in mind the above "Royal" safeguards, and perhaps at another time we will present more.

They decided that the railroads are highways under the control of the State, and that petitions be sent to Congress for better and cheaper transportation. Also that no one should ever be supported for office who had taken back pay, or an advance of salary by the act of March 3, 1873.

ABROAD.

—The cable between Duxbury and St. Pierre has been repaired.

Inquiry was instituted as to the cause, when it was discovered that the "nursery milk" was the source of the evil. The faculty recommended that for the future all milk be boiled before use. Perhaps the same recommendation would hold good in the United States.

BRITISH NAVAL CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE SPANISH INSURGENTS.

Upon notice from the Admiral of his intention to take the vessels, the insurgents answered that the forts would open fire upon the British squadron if the attempt was made.

The ram Numancia was brought to anchor at the entrance to Escombrera Bay, within range of the Lord Warden, the British flagship, and the two vessels lay with their broadsides towards each other.

On the 29th August Vice Admiral Yelverton replied that he would allow forty hours for reconsideration, at the expiration of which time he would take the vessels.

On the 30th August, Senor Aquilas communicated to Vice Admiral Yelverton the hope of the Junta that the affair might be amicably arranged.

There is little doubt that the insurgents will attack the British fleet if they attempt to remove the Spanish vessels without coming to some agreement on the subject.

THE GALE IN NOVA SCOTIA.

The brig T. W. A. Rogers, which left Liverpool, N. S., on Feb. 12, for Barbadoes, has not been heard of since.

The schooner Carrie Rich, Captain Thompson, was wrecked on North Cape Reef, and all hands, seven in number, perished, among them being three Prince Edward Islanders, Captain McLeod and John Gillespie, of New London, and John McKinnen of Goose River. Several vessels were wrecked near the North Cape of Prince Edward's Island. Eight bodies have been picked up on the east side of that place.

Captain Sperrinan, of the schooner G. W. Fall, reports that when off Sambro Light passed the brigantine Dundee, Capt. Bradshaw, totally dismasted, and a schooner, bottom up, whose name he could not make out. Tugs have gone to their assistance.

Tent Meeting No 3.

This meeting, at Menomonee, commenced July 16, and closed August 4, and then we were urged very strongly to stay one week longer; but we had adjourned other meetings in order to remain as long as we did, yet we are persuaded that if the meeting could have been continued some longer it would have eventuated in more good. As it was, there is cause for thankfulness and courage.

I may say the hearing was good from the beginning. Many were convinced of the truths we love so well; two were baptized, and some others owned it to be their duty, but chose to defer it until some more convenient time (a very dangerous conclusion.) We should not like to take such a risk after knowing our duty.

We first pitched the tent a little out from the business centre, but finally moved it out to the public square. Here I had a large attendance of the intelligent, working and business citizens of the place Some of the most wealthy came in a few times, but the ministers of the different orders stood upon their dignity, or learning, or piety, or at least made no report of themselves under the the canvas. My audience outside was, some evenings, considerable. I heard that two ministers were there.

I obtained four subscribers for THE TIMES, distributed a large number of tracts, sold two "Plan of Redemption," preached the word of the kingdom to a good many, think some seed fell in good ground, that will be seen as the full corn in the ear in the day when the Master shall come.

On Saturday evening, the 2d of August, I asked for those who believed in the doctrine and intended to live in readiness for the coming One to rise. There was a good response. I could not count them, but think there were over thirty; yet I am satisfied there were more than three times that number that were convinced we had the truth, notwithstanding how few there are compared to the number convinced, who are brought to surrender unconditionally to be saved by Christ. They seek some other arrangement, some self-made plans, not entirely willing to become fools that they may be wise. My surprise is increased when I see how plainly the doctrine of Christ is revealed. He is the door the way, the truth, and the resurrection, and the life. In short, "he is made of God to us wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption." What more do we want? It is as a good colored brother said at the Sparta camp meeting: Give me Jesus and you may have all else. Ah for the sin subduing power of faith that makes Christ our own.

The tent was seated throughout with good seats with backs, obtained from a hall. The floor was Nature's green carpet; the desk was decorated with evergreens and ornamented with Nature's smiling flowers, with a rich current of air expanding the lungs of the listening audience. Altogether it was a comfortable place of worship. Never did I look down on my audience with more satisfaction that the friends had done all they could for the physical and intellectual comfort of those who came to hear God's last message of mercy to man.

Eld. G. W. Turner was with me four days. It seemed hard to part with him; I love to labor with him. Thank God there are no contingencies that will call Jesus away, if we will teach our hearers to observe all things whatsoever he has commanded us to do.

The order throughout was good very good. On Sunday evening, when we attended to the ordinance of the Lord's Supper and parting with the usual salutation, it was as silent as possible. The same order prevailed at the baptismal occasions. There were very few believers there when the meeting commenced—I would include all—and but three of them were of my view of the Scriptures; four were of the seventh day order, yet they showed the true Christian spirit by doing all they could to promote the interest of the meeting and add to my comfort. One seventh day brother paid over $30 in cash to sustain the glorious cause of our soon-coming King. Another brother that was of the so-called age-to-come, who lived seven miles out, often walked that distance to meet with us, and also helped after a godly manner; others done what they could. I mention this to show the contrast between pure religion and sectarianism. I love the liberal, whole-hearted Christian, who, though he may see the Sabbath binding on him, or thinks he sees probation in the 1,000 years future, can—notwithstanding these side issues—feel inspiration enough in the coming of the Lord to rise above all other interest, and put side and shoulder to the wheel to warn the world of its approaching doom.

I wish all could see how shallow and ill-bred sectarianism is. I wish it was dead. I would go 1,000 miles, at my own expense, to preach its funeral discourse, and would write the epitaph and place it where Job wanted his words placed, (in the rock), and it would be this: Death is an eternal sleep.

The Norwegian tract that Br. Wellcome wrote, and Br. H Holmboe translated into Norwegian, although there were serious blunders in it on account of not sending the proof sheet to Br. Holmboe for correction; yet I distributed what I had with me, reminding them of the errors they contained. They were readily received and read, and, like the noble Bereans, led to search the Scriptures to see if these things were so. A Norwegian, who has been interested since hearing Br. Turner last winter, has fully come out in the faith: he told me that he had to daily answer questions and explain Scripture to his people, and said that field was fully ready for the seed. I could have done much good with that tract if it had been corrected. Also among the Germans there was a good interest to hear and read. One said to me: We can build a house to preach this doctrine in; and if you will stay with us a week longer we will see what we can do towards it. More might be told, but least I should be thought egotistical, I forbear. What I have said has been said to point out our lack of energy in providing means for their enlightenment. I believe they are the idle ones in the market place, because no one has hired them. They will have but an hour to work, yet some of them will yet receive their penny.

Brethren and sisters, it is not enough that we are enlightened, but we must make a sacrifice to save others; let hoarding up treasures, or holding on to treasures we never will need, be banished from among us forever. Let us put all the means we can spare into this glorious saving bank; let it be like Samson's last effort; we are certain it will be more glorious.

The church at Volga cheered us with a kindly letter, for which I have not space.

The State was divided into two districts, Northern and Southern, for evangelical purposes, and G. W. Green was appointed evangelist for the Southern, and E. C. Andrews for the Northern District; and they were instructed to solicit contributions towards their support in their respective fields of labor.

The President of the conference was instructed to prepare and publish in THE TIMES an address to the Adventists of Indiana, soliciting liberal donations for the support of our evangelists.

The following was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Board of the W. A. C. P. Society have no right, legal or moral, to lease or sell out to a few individuals, property belonging to the Adventist people; and that we, the members of the Indiana A. C. Conference, assembled at Colfax, do hereby enter our most solemn protest against any such action, believing that, if the property must change hands, it should again pass into the hands of the old Association.

G. W. Green, E. C. Andrus and Jas. Nafe were appointed delegates to the next meeting of the W. A. C. P. Society.

Conference adjourned to meet again at Colfax on Thursday, before the last Sunday in August, 1874.

Being Yoked with Unbelievers.

DEAR BR. SHELDON.—In looking over T TIMES of August 12, we notice an artic headed "Unequally Yoked." It seems to m that the writer of this article is laboring und a serious mistake. "Be ye not unequal yoked together with unbelievers," etc., surely a prominent and important comman and is applicable to all unholy alliances, ma riage not excepted. The Book of God, whic we claim to be our guide, is as plain and e plicit upon this subject as upon any othe "Come out from the world, and be ye sep rate," is another of the same class of command Certainly, this does not mean that we fo lowers of Christ are to throw ourselves int the immediate embrace of the world, (all those who do not believe and obey the gospel of our Lord and Saviour are counted as his enemies.) "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." "Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Can any one, possessing the spirit or disposition of the Master, choose a life companion from the ranks of his enemies? There were no such immunities granted under the Mosiac dispensation, and certain it is that there are no such privileges allowed in the Christian code. It is true, the apostle teaches that where husband and wife are both out of Christ, and one should be converted, the converted one must not leave the unconverted; but if they should be lawfully separated by death or otherwise, a brother or sister may marry, but "only in the Lord."

We feel sad to say that there are other unhallowed affinities entered into by those who assume to be lovers of God and his cause, which seek to undermine the whole fabric, for which Jesus shed his blood. We allude to the secret, oath-bound societies flourishing around us made up of Mahommedans, Mormons, adulterers, professed Christians, and every other grade of being save the meek and lowly follower of Jesus. Surely, the apostle put his prophetic eye directly on the works of these great deceivers in these latter days when he penned the second chapter of his second letter to the Thessalonians.

JOHN AYLSWORTH.

Barrington, Cook County, Ill.

From O. A. Sower, Eagle Lake, Minn.

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ:—It is with pleasure that I read your letters from different parts of the Union, and it does cheer my heart to know that a small band is preparing to meet the Lord in peace. A very small number it is, compared with the vast multitude that is traveling the broad road to destruction. May the Lord revive his work and may many more sinners be brought to Christ, for the time is short. The Judge stands waiting. Oh! now is the time; tomorrow is not yours. We know not at what moment our Lord may appear to reward every one according to their works. Dear readers, may we all work for him while the day lasts, for the night cometh when no man can work. Let us watch and pray, so that we will be ready for the marriage supper of the Lamb, there to praise his holy name forever. I feel to praise the Lord for his goodness to me, for he sought me a stranger and brought me back into his fold. I do love him, and am trying in my weak way to do his blessed will. It is good to serve the Lord, and when I think of his great love for us, all I can say is, Oh Lord! what wilt thou have me do? I have consecrated my all to the Lord, and I mean, by his grace assisting me, to see the end of a christian's life, for he hath said, "My grace is sufficient." And now, brothers and sisters, I would say in conclusion, let us have on the wedding garment, and be ready, for he will soon come to receive his church.

From F. A. Childs.

We notice with pleasure that many of the great Advent family are giving in their testimony for the Lord through the medium of THE TIMES. We thought it about time that Egypt be heard and her confession given; not that she had any new or strange thing to offer, but rather that she might free her mind and speak a word for her Master. We still live, and thank God that the good cause is advancing. Although our progress is slow, we feel that it is truthful; a deeper interest is manifest among the brethren, and we see a disposition to draw nearer to our God. The congregations wherever we preach, are growing larger at every appointment, and it does our soul good to feed the starving people with the words of truth.

We had the pleasure of baptizing two candidates at our last appointment in Johnson County, and one in Jackson County. In both instances the occasion was of marked interest to the church and people. Truly, the good Lord is on the side of truth. One of our brethren in Johnson county is now exercising his gift in the cause of truth; may the good Lord still carry on the good work.

residence), then over the lake to Michigan, down through Indiana, and last, but not least, the good work in the South. Surely the cause is national; God bless it everywhere. It is especially cheering for us to hear from Sparta, Wis. It was there, many years ago, that we united with the Baptist Church in that place; not that it was the church of our choice, but as there were none of our faith; we accepted it as nearest the truth and worked in it for more than fifteen years, but when a door was opened here through the preaching of Br. Burr and others, we did not hesitate for a moment to take the stand for truth. When we hear from such brethren as Barker and Palmer, with these co-workers we are led to exclaim, "What a good work the Lord hath wrought." Often have we met those brethren in the prayer meeting, and now the signs indicate that we shall soon meet to part no more. Our work is great, but the time short, for it to be done, let us then renew our labors and do what we can before the night closes in forever. We feel a deep interest in the welfare of THE TIMES office, and hope it may continue to shed forth the light of truth.

From Eld. J. A. Cargile, Ala.

On the fourth Sabbath in last month I left Ooltewah, East Tennessee, where the church is still enjoying bright hopes for the future. I arrived home on Monday, and Tuesday I joined Br. J. J. Smith on the Sand Mountain, in a meeting which he had begun on Saturday before. As I found everything in good shape, at the request of Br. Smith, the first thing I did was to form an Advent church with nine members, who had asked us by a written petition to do so. The meeting continued over the following Sunday, and resulted in nineteen conversions, and at the close twenty-five or thirty requested prayers. I buried three in baptism and left the church with thirteen members. The Friday following I started when almost too weak to ride on my horse, for I was suffering much from cholera morbus; but I prayed the Lord to give me strength to go, and he heard me, thanks be to his name. I stopped in the community where the glorious meeting had closed; found the house and yard full; tried to speak to them on the Bible hope, for the benefit of those who had lately enlisted in the cause; then stopped at the nearest house, went to bed, took some medicines kindly provided for me by a sister, remained there till just time to reach my next appointment on Saturday, in DeKalb County, Ala., where I had formed a little church in June last, and to my pleasant surprise found a large house reared up and ready for use, since my last visit. It is the only good house ever built in that vicinity for the worship of God. I felt rejoiced, and gave glory to my heavenly father for the energy manifested by the dear little band of eight members. Other denominations kindly gave a helping hand, and the merchants of Trenton, Ga., where I preached in June, very cleverly gave the nails. On Sunday I buried two dear ones in baptism—one of them a sister who had been afflicted for six years, and for three months she has prayed to improve just enough to get to the water, and I was thankful to bury her, and thus give her the chance to show her faith in the resurrection. I then returned home, attended a meeting of the Cumberland Presbyterians, who invited me to labor in the altar, but the minister told me he could not invite me to preach, for if he did he would be involved in difficulties with his denomination. I told him I admired his frankness. I then started for Roarch's Cove, in Middle Tennessee, to preach two funerals for the Methodist brethren, and it being the time of the Baptist Association I came twenty miles out of my way to be there on Friday, and heard the letter read from the church who excluded me. They stated they had excluded me, demanding my credentials, etc., and requested the Association to approve their action, and have it so inserted in their minutes. I then requested the Moderator to have them prove that I had done anything worthy of exclusion. Saturday morning I left them and started across the great Cumberland Mountain, which is the roughest traveling I ever experienced on horseback. Saturday night I lodged on top of the mountain at "The University of the South," a flourishing college under the control of Episcopalians from Cambridge, England. The beautiful village around the college, the pleasant residences nearly all in the form of the cross, and the busy bustle of the inhabitants, together with the railroad trains, filled us with astonishment, as we did not expect to see such wonderful improvements so far out on the mountains. There is also an extensive vineyard, and fruits of all kinds raised in our climate are cultivated. At night I tried to preach on the kingdom, from Acts 1:6. The house was full, and gave good attention; and many invited me to leave another appointment, which I did for to-morrow night.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

Br. H. Zader, after pledging $10 on the debt, says:

I would be glad to do more, but I do not see that I can, at least at present. May God open the hearts of his children to help the Society get clear from this burden. And may God bless all your efforts to do good to the salvation of many.

Sr. Phebe D. Austin, writes:

I live in an isolated place, with no preaching but THE TIMES, no Christian society at all; how could I give up THE TIMES? Although I have not paid for it, yet it comes every week. I am poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith. I have nothing but my pension to help myself with. I have felt sometimes as though I ought not to take the paper, but could not bear to part with it; have lived in hopes that something would turn up that I could make money enough to pay for it. I pledge myself to pay five dollars to free the Society from debt; the Lord willing I will do it. O that I was able to pay the whole of it.

Mary R. Sayre, writes:

I was at a tent meeting at Berrien Springs, Michigan, some four years ago. That was the first time I ever knew there was such people as the Adventists. I attended the meeting all through. The more I heard them preach the better I liked them. I learned more, and understood things that I never could make out before. Mr. Ferris preached in Berrien one year. I attended all the meetings while I was there, and I became a firm believer in that faith. I had to leave soon after, and I have never met a person since, that seems to know that there ever was such a people. The papers are my church. It will be three years next December since I commenced taking the Bible Banner. I like it very much.

James C. Mann, writes:

I love Jesus and I know that he loves me. Then why do I feel down-hearted when people smile at me for believing that he is coming by-and by to destroy the devil and all his works, and to give the new earth to his people forever. But I will try to remember that Jesus says: "Rejoice and be glad when men speak evil" of us, on account of our attachment to him, for great is our reward when he comes; for "his reward is with him, to give every one according to their works." I sometimes think if it were possible to be ashamed when we sit down to the marriage supper of the Lamb of God, most of us would be ashamed, but no such feelings will enter there. Glory to God, who gives us the life that shall never die, in Jesus Christ his well beloved son.

David Young, writes:

Dear brothers and sisters in Christ, I feel that I am in God's vineyard to labor. I am not ashamed to bear my cross, for which I count all things but dross; whatever I am bid to do or say, when Christ commands, I hope I shall obey. We are to follow Jesus. "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." We are not to follow Christ for popularity, or in a cold and formal worship; but to stand in the liberty of the gospel. In Christ's gospel I have liberty proclaimed to me. This is a working day. Jesus expects no idlers. His fire is in Zion, and his furnace is in Jerusalem. We cannot work at his furnace without being heated; and, as I write, I

Ten Commandments.

This is the first and great command:
"Love thou thy God above;"
And this the second: "As thyself,
Thy neighbor thou shalt love."

Who is thy neighbor? He who wants
The help which thou canst give;
And both the law and prophets say,
"This do, and thou shalt live."

BONNIE CHRISTIE.

Two boys were in a school-room alone together, when some fire-works, contrary to the master's express prohibition, exploded. The one boy denied it; the other, Bonnie Christie, would neither admit nor deny it, and was severely flogged for his obstinacy. When the boys got alone again,—

"Why didn't you deny it?" asked the real delinquent.

"Because there were only we two, and one of us must have lied," said Bonnie.

"Then why not say I did it?"

"Because you said you didn't, and I would spare the liar."

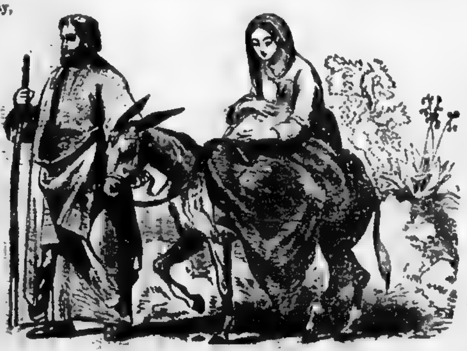
The boy's heart melted—Bonnie's moral gallantry subdued him.

When school resumed, the young rogue marched up to the master's desk and said, "Please sir, I can't bear to be a liar. I let off the squibs," and burst into tears.

The master's eye glistened on the self-accuser, and the unmerited punishment he had inflicted on his school-mate smote his conscience. Before the whole school, hand-in-hand with the culprit, as if they paired in the confession, the master walked down to where Christie sat, and said aloud with emotion:—

"Bonnie, Bonnie, lad—he and I beg your pardon, we are both to blame."

The school was hushed and still, as older schools are apt to be when anything true and noble is being done—so still, they might have heard Bonnie's big boy-tear drop proudly on his copy-book, as he sat enjoying the moral triumph which subdued himself as well as the rest; and when, for the want of something else to say, he gently cried, "Master forever!" the glorious shout of the scholars filled the man's eyes with something behind his spectacles, which made him wipe them before he resumed the chair.



The Nightly Journey.

When night its shades o'er Nazareth threw,
And all was hushed in calm repose;
While gently fell the cooling dew,
Then Joseph from his couch arose.

Warned by the Lord of danger near,
Obedient to the heavenly call;
He, moved with faith and godly fear,
Went forth by night, forsaking all.

With the young mother and her child,
From Nazareth's peaceful scenes he sped,
And on through plains and deserts wild,
From Herod's rage, to Egypt fled.

Thus exiled in his infant years,
A wanderer in a world of woe,
Our Savior passed this vale of tears,
And marked the path his people go.

Our pilgrim Master trod the way,
Of pilgrims in this desert wide;
His was a clouded, stormy day,
From life's first dawning till he died.

Lonely and weary, far from home,
A life of grief the Savior led;
From Bethlehem's cot to Joseph's tomb,
He had not where to lay his head.

But we for whom His life was given,
Oft strew our way with sad complaints;
Forgetful of the grace which heaven
Bestows on God's afflicted saints.

Lord, shall we murmur at our lot,
Or in the pilgrim's path repine?
Oh, be our trials all forgot;
Our lot is blest compared with thine. H. L. H.

THE BOOK OF THANKS.

"I feel so vexed and out of temper with Ben," cried Mark, "that I really must—"

"Do something in revenge?" inquired his cousin Cecilia.

"No; look over my book of thanks."

"What's that?" said Cecilia, as she saw him turning over the leaves of a copy-book nearly full of writing in a round text hand.

"Here it is," said Mark. Then read aloud,—

"'March 8. Ben lent me his hat.'

"Here again: 'Jan. 4. When I lost my shilling, Ben made it up to me kindly.' Well," observed the boy, turning down the leaf, "Ben is a good boy, after all."

"What do you note down in that book?" said Cecilia, looking over his shoulder with some curiosity.

"All the kindnesses that are ever shown me; you would wonder how many they are. I find a great deal of good from marking them down. I do not forget them, as I might do, if I only trusted to my memory; so I hope that I am not often ungrateful; and when I am cross and out of temper, I almost always feel good-humored again if I only look over my book." GOOD FOR CHILDREN OF ALL AGES.

THE ATHEIST'S ORCHARD.

In a certain village of the far west was an atheist. He was a great admirer of infidel writers, but he could see no beauty in the Sun of Righteousness. This man, of course, never entered any place of worship. Indeed, in fruit season, he was specially busy on Sunday in defending his orchard from his great enemies, the woodpeckers, and the idle, profligate persons of the village, who on that day usually made sad havoc among his apples and his peaches.

One day, while at work with his son-in-law,—an atheist like himself, although a more kind and courteous gentleman,—as a pastor of a congregation was passing, he very rudely thus accosted the minister:

"Sir, what is the use of your preaching? What good do you do by it? Why don't you teach these fellows better morals? Why don't you tell them something about stealing, in your sermons, and keep them from robbing my orchard?"

To this the minister pleasantly replied:

"My dear sir, I am sorry that you are so annoyed, and I would most willingly read the fellows who rob your orchard a lecture on thieving; but the truth is, they are so like you and the Major here, that I never get a chance."

"Good, good!" replied the Major, laughing; on which the elder atheist blushed a little, and, in an apologetical tone, said:

"Well, well, I believe it is true enough; it is not the church-going people that steal my apples."

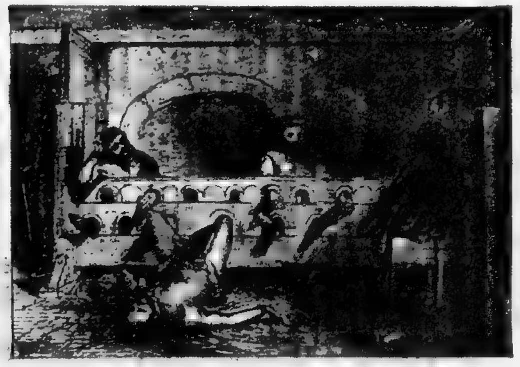
OBEDIENCE.

"I wish I could mind God as my little dog minds me," said a little boy, looking thoughtfully on his shaggy friend; "he always looks so pleased to mind, and I don't."

What a painful truth did this child speak. Shall the poor little dog thus readily obey his master, and we rebel against God, who is our Creator, our Preserver, our Father, our Savior, and the bountiful Giver of every good?

The dog had been kindly treated by his young master, his wants had been supplied, and he did not forget it.

Little children, and grown-up children, too, are daily receiving favors from the kind hand that supplies all our wants, and yet how often we forget our obligation to Him, and refuse to obey Him. Let us try in time to come, to remember with grateful hearts the blessings our Heavenly Father is so constantly bestowing, and obey him cheerfully. Selected.



IN THE STOCKS.

To be placed in the stocks is a very uncomfortable punishment. With the ankles shut in between two planks, and no way to rise, or walk, or sit, or stand, or do anything but lie flat on the back, surely this must be enough to discourage almost any one.

And yet I have read of two persons who were so happy with their feet fast in the stocks that they prayed and sang praises to God at midnight, in an inner prison. They were two poor travelling preachers, who had preached the gospel in a Grecian city, and who prospered very well till a certain woman who was a "spiritual medium" followed them in the streets and bawled out after them: "These men are servants of the most high God, that show us the way of salvation."

This was almost too much to bear. It was hard enough to be abused by the devil, but to have him praise them, was more than they could endure, and so they cast out the unclean spirit in the name of the Lord, spoiled the little game of fortune-telling and divination, ruined the speculation, and so maddened the keepers of the medium who stirred up the people, mobbed the preachers, had them arrested, whipped, and pushed into the inner prison, and their feet made fast in the stocks.

The devil thought he had done something then; but he aimed so high that he missed his mark, and lost his arrow, too. For at midnight these prisoners prayed, and got so merry that they began to sing psalms, and the other prisoners heard them; presently an earthquake thundered along; the prison tottered, doors flew open, bands were loosed, the jailor was frightened, the preachers calmed him, preached to him, and had him converted and baptized, he and all his that same hour of the night; then took an early breakfast and went out of jail next morning with glad hearts and flying colors to preach the gospel in some other place.

A religion that will make a man sing when in prison with his feet fast in the stocks must surely be worth having. Those who wish to read more about it will find something interesting in the sixteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles.

NEVER TELL A LIE.

All liars shall have their part in the lake of fire. Never lie, because Satan is the father of lies and of liars. A false witness will utter lies. A deceitful witness speaketh lies. (Prov. xiv: 5, 25.) He that speaketh lies shall perish. Prov. xix: 9. To deceive any one is to lie. You can act a lie, and the wrong is just as great as to speak one. Do you put your trust in Jesus? Then remember, to lie, to laugh at a lie, or in any way to deceive or be pleased with deception, is to dishonor him who shed his precious blood for the salvation of your soul; and yet God's Word says, "I write unto you, little children, that you sin not, but if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous, and if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins."

If you are not one of God's dear children, and sometimes tell an untruth, do not trust in your promises to do better; just so sure as you expect to, in your own strength, overcome this terrible habit, just so sure will you fail. Go to CHRIST, dear boy or girl, GO TO CHRIST. He can, and he only will help you, and fill you with the spirit of truth, that you may speak the truth from the heart.

OBEDIENCE.

"I wish I could mind God as my little dog minds me," said a little boy, looking thoughtfully on his shaggy friend; "he always looks so pleased to mind, and I don't."

What a painful truth did this child speak. Shall the poor little dog thus readily obey his master, and we rebel against God, who is our Creator, our Preserver, our Father, our Savior, and the bountiful Giver of every good?

The dog had been kindly treated by his young master, his wants had been supplied, and he did not forget it.

Little children, and grown-up children, too, are daily receiving favors from the kind hand that supplies all our wants, and yet how often we forget our obligation to Him, and refuse to obey Him. Let us try in time to come, to remember with grateful hearts the blessings our Heavenly Father is so constantly bestowing, and obey him cheerfully.

IN THE STOCKS.

To be placed in the stocks is a very uncomfortable punishment. With the ankles shut in between two planks, and no way to rise, or walk, or sit, or stand, or do anything but lie flat on the back, surely this must be enough to discourage almost any one.

And yet I have read of two persons who were so happy with their feet fast in the stocks that they prayed and sang praises to God at midnight, in an inner prison. They were two poor travelling preachers, who had preached the gospel in a Grecian city, and who prospered very well till a certain woman who was a "spiritual medium" followed them in the streets and bawled out after them: "These men are servants of the most high God, that show us the way of salvation."

This was almost too much to bear. It was hard enough to be abused by the devil, but to have him praise them, was more than they could endure, and so they cast out the unclean spirit in the name of the Lord, spoiled the little game of fortune-telling and divination, ruined the speculation, and so maddened the keepers of the medium who stirred up the people, mobbed the preachers, had them arrested, whipped, and pushed into the inner prison, and their feet made fast in the stocks.

The devil thought he had done something then; but he aimed so high that he missed his mark, and lost his arrow, too. For at midnight these prisoners prayed, and got so merry that they began to sing psalms, and the other prisoners heard them; presently an earthquake thundered along; the prison tottered, doors flew open, bands were loosed, the jailor was frightened, the preachers calmed him, preached to him, and had him converted and baptized, he and all his that same hour of the night; then took an early breakfast and went out of jail next morning with glad hearts and flying colors to preach the gospel in some other place.

A religion that will make a man sing when in prison with his feet fast in the stocks must surely be worth having. Those who wish to read more about it will find something interesting in the sixteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles.

NEVER TELL A LIE.

All liars shall have their part in the lake of fire. Never lie, because Satan is the father of lies and of liars. A false witness will utter lies. A deceitful witness speaketh lies. (Prov. xiv: 5, 25. He that speaketh lies shall perish. Prov. xix: 9. To deceive any one is to lie. You can act a lie, and the wrong is just as great as to speak one. Do you put your trust in Jesus? Then remember, to lie, to laugh at a lie, or in any way to deceive or be pleased with deception, is to dishonor him who shed his precious blood for the salvation of your soul; and yet God's Word says, "I write unto you, little children, that you sin not, but if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous, and if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins."

If you are not one of God's dear children, and sometimes tell an untruth, do not trust in your promises to do better; just so sure as you expect to, in your own strength, overcome this terrible habit, just so sure will you fail. Go to CHRIST, dear boy or girl, GO TO CHRIST. He can, and he only will help you, and fill you with the spirit of truth, that you may speak the truth from the heart.

Poetry.

Unto Thee.

No, not despairingly
Come I to thee;
No, not distrustingly
Bend I the knee.
Sin hath gone over me,
Yet is this still my plea
Jesus hath died.

O, mine iniquity
Crimson hath been!
Infinite, infinite
Sin upon sin;
Sin of not loving thee,
Sin of not trusting thee,
Infinite sin.

Lord, I confess to thee
Sadly my sin;
All I am tell I thee,
All I have been,
Purge thou my sin away,
Wash thou my soul this day—
Lord, make me clean.

Faithful and just art thou,
Forgiving all;
Loving and kind art thou
When poor ones call.
Lord let the cleansing blood—
Blood of the Lamb of God—
Pass o'er my soul.

Then all is peace and light
This soul within;
Thus shall I walk with thee,
The loved unseen,
Leaning on thee, my God,
Guided along the road,
Nothing between.

The Great Theme.

The great theme of Christian hope and promise is the coming again of our Lord Jesus Christ. A distinguised English divine states, after a careful examination, that at least one verse in every thirty contained in the New Testament refers to this subject. If he had included all the allusions to this great event the proportion would have been much larger. There are in all seven thousand nine hundred and fifty-nine verses in the New Testament and more than three hundred and twenty of them point forward undoubtedly to the appearing again of our Lord Jesus Christ. This fact is very significant, and proves to us the mind of the Spirit with regard to the prominence and frequency with which this matter should come before the minds of Christians, and be handled in our public ministrations. It was certainly one of the chief topics of apostolic instruction and early Christian hope; and it is to be taken as a serious defect in our modern Christianity that so little is made of it, and that the subject is left so much to the handling of those who often treat it in a way very damaging to the whole cause of the gospel. Because some men abuse it is no excuse for our ignoring it knowing as we do that it is a vital part of our creed, and most important in all its bearings.

Ponder then, the fact itself that our blessed Lord is certainly to return again to our world. He is now at the right hand of the Father; but from thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead. Too prone are we to think of Him only as an historic personage, who lived many centuries ago and who has long since passed away, like Pharaoh or Alexander—that all that concerns Him relates to times far removed in the past, with no present reality—and that all we have to do with Him now is the observance of those institutions and precepts which He gave to the world in his earthly lifetime. We do not seem to feel as we ought that the grave that closed over Him for a little while could not hold Him, and he now lives, that He is at this moment making ready for his return hither, and that He will come again in like manner as He was seen going into heaven. And yet it is even so. The Lord himself, even the crucified Man of Nazareth, shall descend from heaven with a shout and with the voice of an archangel and with the trump of God. His feet, once torn with nails, shall stand again upon the mountians of earth; and they that pierced Him shall look upon Him. The terrified soldiers who saw Him die, the blaspheming Pharisees who thirsted for His blood, and rejoiced when they saw it spilled, the infidel horde who in every age have insulted His name and persecuted His Church, and every saint, and every one who reads these lines, shall behold Him, the Son of man, come down again to earth. Despisers of His word—neglecters of His gospel—false professors of His name—and resisters of His grace, who have continually turned their backs upon His calls of mercy—all shall see Him. For he cometh, He cometh to judge the earth.

Ponder, also the solemnity of that great event. It is related of a great French preacher that he was once called to deliver the funeral address of a prince. It was an expressive occasion. All the great ones of the land were there. Majesty itself, with all its royal surroundings, sat clothed in sackcloth and weighed down with grief. All the glory and grandeur of human greatness had shrunk away into nothingness. Only grief and dismay filled and pervaded the assembly. He arose to speak, but utterance seemed denied him. He stood abstracted and lost. A long and awful pause ensued, until breathing itself seemed to be suspended. And when every heart was thrilling he broke the silence by a scarcely-audible whisper—"There's nothing great but God!" The effect was over-whelming.

But if we will just go forward a little in our thoughts to the sort of scene that is to be enacted when the day of Christ's return has come—at the manner in which all greatness and glory shall wilt down before His divine presence—at the sort of feelings which then shall take possession of the great congregation of mankind—it will hardly need a greater master of eloquence to thrill into our souls that there's nothing solemn but the judgment!

There are, indeed, many other solemn things and scenes and occurrences well fitted to move the profoundest depths of human awe; but they are scarcely to be named in comparison with the tremendous solemnity of the day of judgment.

The thunder-storm is very solemn. When the quick arrows of heaven flash forth in their power—when the deep crash of the thunder-bolt startles up communities—when the dread artillery of God rushes along the sky and and rumbles around the world, it is a time of awful sensations. But what is that to the far-sounding crash which shall startle the very dead in their graves and arouse even the long-forgotten into life again!

The earthquake is solemn, when cities totter without a warning and kingdoms rend and islands flee away. But what is that to the tremor which shall convulse our globe and shake heaven itself, when the things which are temporal shall be all swept away!

The volcano is solemn. When its cone of fire, stirred into fury by some spirit of the under-world, shoots to the heavens, and from its burning entrails pours out its rushing lava over whole countries, deluging cities in its course, and burning up flying populations, the scene is appalling! But what is that to the conflagration which shall consume the proudest works of man and overwhelm the armies at which the world quaked!

The funeral of the dear and honored friend is solemn. The heart throbs and the tears flow and the bodily powers almost refuse to do their wonted offices under the intensity of the soul's bitter laceration. But what is that to the obsequies of the world itself, when all this present scene of things shall go down to an eternal grave!

It is solemn and affecting to hear an earthly judge pronounce sentence upon the poor convict. But what is that to the sentence of the Judge eternal, which sends the impenitent to the prison-house of hell and gives over the guilty one to death eternal!

Who, who can do justice to such a [illegible]

Emotion in Religion.

Surface emotion doesn't amount to much and isn't worth much. It comes and goes like the lights and shadows of an April day. But there is a deep and abiding conviction, which is of another character, and has another price.

It seems to me that we want more Christian sensibility, more tenderness, more feeling; or breaking up of the fountains of the great deep, a melting that shall dissolve all our hardness to tears.

This overflowing sensibility, this tender and weeping state, suits well every relation and duty of our Christian life.

Certainly it fits our return to Christ as those who have wandered away from him in paths of worldlines and forgetfulness. Think of coming back to hear him say, "I have somewhat against thee;" carrying in our consciousness of self-reproach, I have not lived so near to Jesus as I ought. I have followed him, like Peter, afar off. If any of us are passing through such an experience, does it not become us to go weeping night and day?

This weeping state suits then the joy of restoration. No one has ever had any very great joy who has never known what it is to weep "tears of joy." Come you, come to Jesus, and receive a full and fresh forgiveness; feel his hand laid upon your head in welcome and benediction; hear him say, "Go in peace, thy sins are forgiven thee;" sing that song,

"Love I much; I'm much forgiven!"

and keep the tears back? If you were revolving it in your heart, O, what compassion my Savior has shown me! Every shadow between my soul and his face has departed; I am in near and constant communion with him once more!" would not your eyes overflow?

Such deep sensibility suits well the offering of earnest prayer. We cannot wrestle with God for great blessings with a heart cool and [illegible], whose pulses are unquickened, whose tenderness is slumbering.

Especially is this tenderness of heart our indispensible preparation for winning souls. You know what the promise is: "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." Tell a man he is in danger of loosing his soul, and tell him as though it were a fact which you bore philosopically, and not as though it were a grief that were breaking your heart, and you will not move him, except to anger and contempt. You can say anything to a man without offense, which you can say through tears. If you fling your arms around his neck, and weep upon him, he cannot resist you. You cannot go hopefully on any errand of salvation unless you go tenderly. Loving and longing don't use cold words.

Pray for this precious grace, or rather for this baptism of all the graces. Bring before your mind all the scenes that stir penitential sorrow, tender joy, love's warm solitude, and the fulness of the heart of Christ.—Rev. A. L. Stone.

Power of Faith.

Childlike faith looks into the Holy Scriptures with an eye of penetrating power, like that of the telescope directed toward the starry heavens. It brings into view glorious things of divine revelation which escape the notice of the common eye, which are wholly invisible to the natural eye. It reduces to symmetry and displays in beautiful proportions many sublime prophecies and glorious promises involved sometimes in contradictory appearances to a superficial reader. The splendor of the starry hosts in the midnight sky, the grand constellations, the brilliant planets, the erratic shooting stars, the galaxy and its innumerable hosts, faint and bright—fill the beholder with perplexity and with profound admiration. This is a fair type of the appearances presented by the precious promises in the oracles of God to the natural man, who fails to study the holy volume as a work of the same hand which built the earth and the heavens and is building the city of God. In its pages are found the brightest examples and the worst, that men may follow the one and see the miserable end of the other; are found also the purest morals, the loftiest sentiments, the tenderest affection, the holiest teachings, the most wonderful miracles, revelations, promises and prophecies, all mixed in with the darkness of sin and wickedness, rebellion and wretchedness, making such a chaos of disorder in the temporal darkness that the learned and the ignorant are sometimes alike puzzled to see the harmony and holiness of Bible history with its testimonies and its laws. Those who read it as a common work of the press soon come to know all about it, as they think, and they lay it aside. While those who study it daily, for wisdom, for instruction in righteousness, and for spiritual nurture, love it more and more as long as they live, and continually find deeper and richer mines of eternal truth in its pages. To the strongest men it gives meat, and milk to babes, with honey out of the rock to every soul that fears the Eternal and desires to learn the Word of life.—Ward's Faith of Abraham and Christ.

Trial.

You can't stand it! Why not? Others have had a much harder time than you. You have not been used well! Very likely. A great many have not been used well; but that is no reason they should kill themselves. You don't mean to kill yourself, but go where they will use you better! Is that the best way? Now, is it not better to think more of how you use others, and less of how they use you? Think of it awhile. Was Jesus always used well? Were the Apostles always used well? What then? did they run from the cause? Let me tell you what to do. "Take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand." Why, bless you, trial is for your good. Endurance is a part of the Christian's life, you know. Sometimes it is the best of doing. Read the benedictions. Does Jesus say, blessed are the people that 'have a good time?' And yet what a 'good time' we sometimes have in doing and enduring. And can we not endure? You can not see what trials are for? May be to prove you, and show you what is in your own heart; may be to keep you from folly, and lightness, and sin, into which men fall if they are not tried; may be to let you know how precious Jesus is to the tried and tempted soul.

"Trials make the promise sweet,
Trials give new life to prayer,
Bring me to the Savior's feet,
Lay me low and keep me there."

Remarkable Telegraphic Feat.

The following story is told of Capt. J. H. Mills, a Vermont telegraph operator, who, being on a snow bound train where severe suffering was anticipated, without speedy relief, cut the telegraph wires, took the ends into a car where they could be sufficiently warmed to admit of their being readily handled, and by sticking the ends together was enabled to "call" the operator at one of the principal stations on the road. He then sent the following message: "Trouble. Answer slowly. I am working without an instrument; I will receive your answer through my tongue."

Capt. H. received the answer by putting one end of the wire above and the other under his tongue, and letting the electric current pass through it, when he was able to read by the succession of sharp and somewhat painful electrical shocks. His success was perfect, and he not only sent and received messages for the conductor, but for several of the passengers. The only ill consequences of the exploit was the total loss of taste which Capt. H. suffered for several days afterward.—The Methodist.

Is God with us? What more do we want? Omniscience omnipotence, and infinite love, are all these leading the van? Then we will not fear to follow, though it were into Hades itself; for if Jehovah led the way His saints would be safe even there. Treasure up that direction. Do not think so much of the presence of friends in trouble as the presence of God in trouble. "Fear not." What is the next word? I am with thee: be not dismayed." What is the next sentence? I am thy "God." The richest consolation you can have is that which is derived from the presence of the Lord.

You can't stand it! Why not? Others have had a much harder time than you. You have not been used well! Very likely. A great many have not been used well; but that is no reason they should kill themselves. You don't mean to kill yourself, but go where they will use you better! Is that the best way? Now, is it not better to think more of how you use others, and less of how they use you? Think of it awhile. Was Jesus always used well? Were the Apostles always used well? What then? did they run from the cause? Let me tell you what to do. "Take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand." Why, bless you, trial is for your good. Endurance is a part of the Christian's life, you know. Sometimes it is the best of doing. Read the benedictions. Does Jesus say, blessed are the people that 'have a good time?' And yet what a 'good time' we sometimes have in doing and enduring. And can we not endure? You can not see what trials are for? May be to prove you, and show you what is in your own heart; may be to keep you from folly, and lightness, and sin, into which men fall if they are not tried; may be to let you know how precious Jesus is to the tried and tempted soul.

"Trials make the promise sweet,
  Trials give new life to prayer,
Bring me to the Savior's feet,
  Lay me low and keep me there."

Remarkable Telegraphic Feat.

The following story is told of Capt. J. H. Mills, a Vermont telegraph operator, who, being on a snow bound train where severe suffering was anticipated, without speedy relief, cut the telegraph wires, took the ends into a car where they could be sufficiently warmed to admit of their being readily handled, and by sticking the ends together was enabled to "call" the operator at one of the principal stations on the road. He then sent the following message: "Trouble. Answer slowly. I am working without an instrument; I will receive your answer through my tongue."

Capt. H. received the answer by putting one end of the wire above and the other under his tongue, and letting the electric current pass through it, when he was able to read by the succession of sharp and somewhat painful electrical shocks. His success was perfect, and he not only sent and received messages for the conductor, but for several of the passengers. The only ill consequences of the exploit was the total loss of taste which Capt. H. suffered for several days afterward.—The Methodist.

Is God with us? What more do we want? Omniscience omnipotence, and infinite love, are all these leading the van? Then we will not fear to follow, though it were into Hades itself; for if Jehovah led the way His saints would be safe even there. Treasure up that direction. Do not think so much of the presence of friends in trouble as the presence of God in trouble. "Fear not." What is the next word? I am with thee: be not dismayed." What is the next sentence? I am thy "God." The richest consolation you can have is that which is derived from the presence of the Lord.

Was the Death Penalty Inflicted upon Adam and all his posterity for Disobedience only?

J. S. WIMBISH.

This question should be of the deepest interest to every inquiring Christian. The answer readily given by all orthodox theologians (so-called) would be an affirmative one, with the addenda that death temporal, death spiritual, and death (or life in misery) eternal was the full measure of the penalty attached to the transgression of that command—"in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." The entire text reads thus: "And the Lord God commanded the man saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."

Now, was the penalty of death inflicted on account of disobedience only? Was there nothing in the fruit—nothing in the nature of that fruit—which was inimical to the nature and constitution of man, and poisonous to his innocent blood? Or is it not possible that it produced the element of blood in man? I know some will think this is wild speculation and an unfounded postillate. But is it so? Man was created in the image of God. God is a spirit. "A spirit hath not flesh and bones." Or, I would say, God is not flesh, blood and bones as we are. Christ our Savior took upon himself the nature of the seed of Abraham. The life of Abraham was the blood, for the blood of all sinful or earthly creatures is the life. But Christ shed his blood for sinful man; that is, that which was the life of man and also the cause of his death was "poured out unto death." His blood was innocent because there was no guilt found in him. But who will pretend to say that after Christ's victory over death and the grave, that his immortal body of flesh and bones was quickened and made alive by the element of blood? No one I presume will contend that Christ with flesh and blood went up to the Father's throne to intercede for man, when Paul has confidently affirmed that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. He was quickened by the spirit of God. And I contend that this spirit enlivened him and took the place of his blood which he had poured out unto death.

Now, if Christ came to undo what was done in Eden, and overcome him who hath the power of death—which power he exerted over Adam and Eve when he speaking through a serpent caused them to disobey their kind and loving Father and Creator, why should we not argue that had Adam been sufficient for the purposes of God in creating him he would have been made perfect, and by the tree of life secured immunity against sin and death? He would then have been, after complete and perfect trial against the tempting offers from Satan, immortalized in his primitive organism. How long this would have taken I know not, but I am assured he would have been on trial until the tempter would have given way and sought him no more. That is to say he would have been only sufficiently tried, and when he could, by his own inherent hatred of sin and love of life, been proof against the allurements of Satan, God would have led him to the tree of life.

When sin has no attractions for the sinner he may be said to be proof against sin, for he desires something more holy. So it would have been with Adam and Eve. They would have had no desire to sin. And if they had resisted the first tempting offer of Satan—that of becoming gods—it is more than likely he would have lost considerable in the contest. If they had successfully resisted to the third temptation, no doubt the tempting offer—coming from such an unworthy source—would have assumed to them the aspect of a gross insult, and been refused and spurned from them with indignation. We would like to inquire further here in regard to the possibility of Adam's having secured the prize of immortality, but my great failing of verbosity warns me to hurry towards a close if I would be read. But let me say that I do not think it was impossible, as some contend, but very improbable, as God himself knew before he created man. Many are inclined to ask foolish questions here in reference to God's doing what he knew would result in evil to man. My general answer to such foolish inquiries is that if God had made man different from what he did, man would not have been man, but something else. For I contend that there is no place for occupancy in all God's universe but he has filled it with a creature perfectly adapted to its surroundings. From the creeping worm to the bright seraphim there is the display of infinite love and untold wisdom. Man fills a place in God's creation a little lower than the angels, but which without him would be a void. Let us inquire now, and see if it was an arbitrary and tyranical command that God gave to Adam when he forbid him the fruit.

He gave him leave to eat of all the fruit in the garden except this one, and perhaps the tree of life. For one I do not think Adam had partaken of the tree of life before he did of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. I think it was inaccessable, and a knowledge of its existence and nature would have followed after eating the forbidden fruit, their eyes being open. Now, if all the blessings in the garden of Eden were offered to man freely, why should that have been withheld which to man appeared to be as good as any? I hold then if this fruit had been for the weal of man God would not have placed an injunction against its use.

And further, that if God had merely intended to give Adam an arbitrary command, any other fruit than that of the knowledge of good and evil would have done as well. One in fact that would have been harmless in its nature and which would have failed to teach them they were naked. For there must have been something in the nature of the fruit affecting the entire physical man, for they knew they were naked after they had partaken of it. Some say they knew this from a consciousness of having sinned against God. I say they knew it from having the consciousness of an impending death before them. And this consciousness of approaching dissolution would have put them on the search for the tree of life—for man has been in search of the elixir of life from time immemorial. But we see the wisdom and love of God again displayed in driving them from the garden that they might not become immortal sinners, and outside the plan of redemption as their would-be master was. I will illustrate here to further elucidate the point I wish to establish: A father says to his child—a young and innocent child,—Son, you can go into the garden and admire the beautiful flowers and pluck as many as you wish for a boquet, but don't put any of those yellow jemine in your mouth, for in the day thou doest it thou shalt surely die. We would say, You will surely die. But perhaps an enemy to the father who desires the death of the child gains the confidence of the innocent child and pointing to the beautiful flowers says, Take those sweet flowers and eat them, see how pretty they look, they are sweeter than honey. The child refuses perhaps, and replies to the tempter, Father forbid my eating them, for he said I would die. (The child knows it is something dreadful to die.) The tempter assures the child that if he will eat them he will be just like his father at once, tall and manly. This is enough, the child sees the tempter put them in his mouth and appear to swallow, he does the same and dies in agony. So our first parents were beguiled and did eat, taking into their system that which was noxious and productive of decay and death.

Here another foolish question is often asked: Why did God suffer Satan to tempt our first parents? I call it a foolish question, and so may all reflective men; yet I may call it so from a reason quite different from that of others. I say it is a foolish question, (1) because a trial of some sort awaited Adam, and (2) because I believe the devil was an inhabiter of the earth long centuries before man was created.

This is not altogether a groundless speculation. The Bible speaks of the devil being in the garden but does not tell how he happened to be there. I infer from this that he was in the world before man. Angels were made before man, and the devil is called the arch-fiend and leader of the fallen angels. We find a beautiful description of his fall and his struggles at the head of his princes and warriors in "Milton's Paradise Lost;" but I try to draw all doctrine, positive and inferential, from the pages of God's Word. So if Satan was in the garden of Eden, he must have been there before, as the Bible does not speak of his being made after man. Moses takes up the account of time about 4004 years before Christ; so all prior to that account, if touched upon at all by him it is in the book of Job, which is the peer of "Milton's Paradise Lost," and is ascribed to the pen of Moses. He there tells of God speaking to Job out of the whirlwind and asking him to declare unto him his whereabouts when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Satan was then doubtless in heaven as he is or was one of the sons of God, and shouted for joy when all the hosts of heaven joined their voices in proclaiming the Great Jehovah their universal King. Doubtless it was subsequent to this great day of rejoicing and while thick darkness was still a swaddling band for the earth, that he sinned against God and with many others, who kept not the first estate was cast down to the earth. At that time the earth being void and destitute of light might very properly be called a prison. God's spirit had not yet moved upon the face of the waters nor had the dry land appeared, and doubtless the earth in that state was the "tartaras" into which according to the apostle Peter the angels that kept not their first estate were cast, and the chains consist in their inability to get away from this earth—being reserved here among wicked men until the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

So we infer the creation of man was to fill a void caused by the fallen angels and man was placed in the earth,—to speak in plain parlance,—to whip the devil out; but the wily enemy held possession and purposed to keep it. Therefore he beguiled our first parents.

The struggle is prolonged, and the life of every man is a warfare. But to God who hath all things in his hands and seeth the end from the beginning, our great Captain has come to the rescue, and is now before the throne awaiting the fullness of time, when Satan shall be made his footstool. That which Adam in the flesh could not do Christ through the Spirit has accomplished—the victory over Satan. "O death where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?"

Brethren, let us try to learn more and more every day that we live, of the nature and destiny of man. Let us study that we may teach others, for I find the great majority of men although they [illegible] doubt the existence of a God, are ever ready to lay all blame upon him for their own sins, and ascribe him the imperfections of their nature, saying, "why hast thou made me thus?" Forgetting that the potter hath power over the clay to make one vessel to honor and another to dishonor. Unmindful of the fact that God is love and not a tyrant. Looking over the great truth that the wages of sin is death. Not knowing that after Adam had partaken of a noxious fruit it were impossible for him in that body to live forever. Of course God could have destroyed Adam and Eve, and put another couple on trial, but would the result of a thousand experiments have proved more satisfactory? I trow not. The devil was there, and he is here, and he was brave enough to tempt three several times our blessed Savior. He is a great and formidable enemy, not only of man, but of God also. But God can and will destroy him when Jesus descends from heaven to take vengeance. But I weary you.

"What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch." Come Lord in thy person and relieve our watch, that we may lay aside the pilgrim's staff and receive the crown.

Resurrection.

JOHN T. REA.

Ever from the depths of my inmost nature arises a feeling and joy and longing at the sound of that word—"Resurrection." Knowing, as I do, that our days upon the earth "are as a shadow," and "swifter than a weaver's shuttle," my mind has often been filled with the inquiry, "What is beyond?" "If a man die shall he live again? Is there a beyond? or is life blotted out in the gloom of the grave? Is it possible that the associations and friendships formed in this life perish in the tomb forever? Must the cold earth hold forever the forms of those we have loved in this life?

Oh, sad indeed and unbearable would be the thought to us who have laid our dear ones in the silent tomb, that we never again might clasp the hand, or catch the glance of love from those beaming eyes, or listen to the musical voice of our loved ones. Oh no, it cannot be so.

Heathen mythology in vain has endeavored, in its darkness and superstition, to peer into the mysteries of the great beyond, and human nature, revolting and shrinking back from the tyrant, death, seeks for some escape from his toils. But heathen mythology, in all its searchings for immortality, never dreamed of a resurrection of the dead, or that mortality should put on immortality, but, in the darkness of their own wisdom, asserted the inherent immortality of some part of man which escaped to an elysium or mythical land of shadow, or else run into the fanciful theory of the transmigration of souls.

Truly, the "world by wisdom knew not God," neither can they understand how Christ can raise the dead, being ignorant of the fact that the power that first formed can re-form.

Even the faith of the prophet seemed staggered at the question, "Can these dry bones live?" for he answers, "O Lord God thou knowest."

I am aware that very many in this present day, in fact nearly all denominations of professed christians, blindly cling to the old heathen mythological view of the inherent immortality of some part of man, and almost every week we hear it said, by those who profess to be ministers of the gospel of our Lord, that "another immortal soul has gone to heaven," or "has escaped to the spirit land," etc., but all such statements are the result of a misapprehension of what the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ is, and of course is contrary to all its teachings. Such views rob us of th[illegible] that sent his only begotte[illegible] world that the world mig[illegible] they rob the Savior of the glory of his first mission to earth; it does away with a day in which he will judge the world; does away with a judgment; does away with the "resurrection of the dead!" Away with such theories.

What! Is the "resurrection of the dead," spoken of in the Bible, nothing but the flying of an "immortal spirit" from a mortal body? If so, how how then is it a resurrection of the "dead?" What! do we go directly to heaven or hades when we die! If we then are judged worthy of either place, why has God appointed a judgment day? Are there two judgments? and what is the use of the "resurrection of the body?" as some term it, and what is the need of a Saviour if a man is "all immortal," as Bishop Clarke says?

Oh when will men "cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?"

No wonder the resurrection of the dead is "scouted" by many in this day as it was at the time when Paul on Mars Hill preached "Jesus and the resurrection" to the Athenians. Surely it is high time for every lover of God's word to bestir themselves if the resurrection taught in the Bible is to be fritted away in this manner.

Surely the time now is that Paul said should come when men should "be turned unto fables;" but to us who see these things it is but a positive omen of the soon coming glorious resurrection.

The "scoffers" are here who say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" and by this we know full well that we are in the "last days," and that the personal glorious appearing of our Lord is night at hand when the "dead shall be raised incorruptible. "Then," and then alone, "will come to pass the saying, 'death is swallowed up in victory?'"

Resurrection! To me, as I see the creation groaning and travailing in the pains of a second birth, and read that "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man the things that God hath prepared for them that love him," that word has a deeper significance. It buoys me up amid the troubles and afflictions of life, and when upon a bed of sickness and pain it has been my comfort and hope; and when I lie down at night, not knowing whether I shall see the rising of the morning's sun, that word comes as a blessed angel of light to dispel my fears of the night of death, by bringing the hope of the "rising of the" sun of righteousness in the morning of the resurrection.

"I am the resurrection and the life." Yes, without thee, blessed Savior, there can be no resurrection, for "Thou hast the words of eternal life." Eternal life! Can we grasp the idea conveyed in those words? and with them comes the promise—"There shall be neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." Oh eternal life of happiness. Ah, yes, this is the "gospel" or good news to those who "sit in darkness" and "under the shadow of death"—"eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Good news to a dying world; not endless life to an undying entity, nor endless spiritual death to an immortal spirit, but a real tangible resurrection of the whole man from the power of death and the grave. But some say—this is materialism. Is it? Then I say, would to God there were more just such materialism in our churches to-day; would to God that the vail of heathen mythology and satanic delusion were taken away from the eyes of our people, that they might see that even as Christ was raised from the dead (being the first fruits) even so we also shall be raised.

The body of our Savior was not there when they came to anoint him, and he afterward affirmed to his disciples that "a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have."

Can we object to such materialism? No. When we reject it, we reject Christ.

Is it not, rather, something to be desired that we shall see the "same eyes" beaming upon us and see the same face and hear the same voice of our loved once, when—

"Past the dark portal
We stand up immortal,
And sweep with hosannas
The jasper-light sea."

O, let us believe all that the prophets have spoken, and contend for and hold on to our faith a little longer; for we shall soon behold the down-rushing glories of the New Jerusalem, and hear the welcome voice of our "life-giver," saying, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

May the earnest prayer of our hearts ever be, "Thy kingdom come."

Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen.

Never.

A. ARMOUR.

[Second Article.]

In the former article I referred to some reasons why the rendering of ou mee....eis ton aiona,—"never" in the common version, "not....forever" in the A. Bible Union version twice, "not ....forever" in the Catholic version except twice—is not satisfactory. The reasons, in brief, are: (1) In the passage referred to, John 8:51, "he shall never [that is, at no time] see death," is untrue in the literal sense of the word death. (2) "He shall not see death forever," that is, shall see death but not forever, or always, is meaningless in view of the fact that those addressed believed in a resurrection, or termination of literal death; and, that the first death is not forever whether we keep Christ's saying or not. (3) The same words are made to mean one thing in one place, and another thing in another place; "not always" in John 8:51, "not at all" in ch. 11:26. (4) If the meaning were "not always," or "not at all"; "not forever," or, "never" other words would properly have been used.

I offered a literal rendering of the Greek words, the most literal possible, so far as I know; and instead of "never," or "not....forever," I would read "not....in the age." I propose to examine whether this rendering is admissible in every place where the phrase occurs.

The first place is John 4:14, Jesus said to the woman of Samaria "whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never—not in the age—thirst, but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

Preconceptions aside, when do we drink living water, water of life, and thirst no more? When is it "they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more,....for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne....shall lead them unto living fountains of waters?"—(Rev. 7:16, 17.) Where is the "river of water of life," (Rev. 22:1; Zech. 4:8; Ez. 47:1, 9,) is it in this age or the next? And where is "everlasting life?" Not in this age, but "God will render . ..eternal life,... in the day when God will judge the secrets of men, by Jesus Christ."—(Rom. 2:7, 9 16.) Everlasting life is zoeen aionion—the life of the age. Jesus uses the future tense, "I shall give—he shall not thirst, in the age," therefore, and from the analogy of the Word, we conclude that the age is the future age. If we once drink of the living water we thirst no more; "he that believeth on me shall never thirst,"—(ch. 6:35,) but it is after "the last day."

The next passage is John 8:51, 52, before noticed. Here the verb is also future, and we conclude the age is future, "shall not see death in the [future] age."

Next, ch. 10:28. "I give [or grant] unto them eternal [aionion] life, [the life of the age,] and they shall never—not in the age—perish, neither shall any one pluck them out of my hand." "They shall [future tense] not perish in the [future] age." Some who "hear" and "follow" for a time, in this age, I doubt not, will perish at last. But when the sheep actually possess everlasting life, and have "put on immortality" they "shall not perish in the age." Now, "the righteous perisheth,"—(Is. 57:1,) then, they shall not perish.

The contrast between now, and then, is shown in our next text, John 11:26. Literal, physical, first death is here spoken of, beyond a doubt. "Lazarus is dead," he "sleepeth," but Jesus is come "to awake him out of sleep." He says to Martha, "Thy brother shall rise again." Martha replies, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." Jesus then said, "I am the resurrection and the life, [the cause of them,] he that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live." More literally, "the believing [one]—the believer in me—if he dieth, he shall live," or "live again." The Greek rendered "though he were dead," is the second aorist tense of the subjunctive mood, and denotes contingency; now, it is possible a believer in Christ may die, in this age, die literally as Lazarus, "and if he dieth, he shall live," not "he does live;" the verb "die" is in the aorist tense, but the verb "live" is in the future tense. "And whosoever liveth"—"and all the living"—"and every one living," (all those who escape the contingency of death by living at the end of the age,) "everyone living and believing in me dieth not in this age." In one age the believer may die,—in the other he may not. The form of the verb "die" is the same in both verses, (25, 26). If he dies in this age, he shall live in the future age; if he liveth till the end of this age, till the resurrection in the last day, he dieth NOT AT ALL, but is "changed" from mortality to immortality "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye."—(1 Cor. 15:51–53.)

This phrase occurs again, John 13:8, "Peter saith unto him, thou shalt never—not in the age—wash my feet." It is used here as in 1 Cor. 8:13, where Paul says, "I will eat no flesh while the world standeth," or, literally, "I will eat no flesh in the age." Both use it as a strong expression, and of course, refer to the present age. I think those are all the passages where the double emphatic, negative is used with eis ton aiona.

A single negative is used in Mark 3:29. "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never—not in the age—forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation." Critical editions of the Greek read "sin" for "damnation,"—"is guilty of aionion—age lasting sin." The meaning is "hath not forgiveness in the age" when alone forgiveness may be obtained. Griesbach notes that eis ton aiona "in the age" is omitted in some MSS., thus simply reading "hath not forgiveness." Those are all the places where the word "never" in the common version is from "not not," or "not....in the age."

If the Holy Spirit judged four or five words necessary to convey the meaning, is it right for us to compress it into one or two, when we have words nearly equivalent to those he used? This applies as well to "forever." Had the article "the" been given in our translation, it would have been better, as Heb. 7:17, "Thou art a priest forever," (eis ton aiona in the age,) for the forever; not as if there were but one aion, age, ever, or forever, but a particular one is pointed out.

The common comment on John 8:51 and 11:26 is that Jesus referred to "the second death, eternal death." There can be no "second" without a "first," we cannot take a second step without having taken a first. If the first is not retraced, the second is like the first, but farther onward.

In the case of the first death the step is retraced, the man is brought back to life again, returned to his former standing as before he died; and the second death must be the first over again, if it is after a resurrection.

Eternal death I have heard thus defined: "the sinner is spiritually dead, and spiritual death is eternal death begun." Then the "second" comes before the first! And it is no use preaching to sinners, if a death is begun in them which can never be recovered from, or which is eternal in its duration.

In John 8:51; 11:26, etc., Jesus spoke simply of death, but he defined the period in which it would not be experienced by the believer; he did not define the kind of death at all. Death is the extinction of life, whether it be physical, spiritual, moral, social, or political; and whether it be temporal or eternal.

Beecher-Religion---Too Pious.

S. K. GIBSON.

One of the signs of the times in which we live is the persistent scoffing at "piety," by the professed friends of Jesus.

Piety signifies veneration, with love of God. To be pious, then, is to reverence God as the Supreme One. It is to adore him as our Father, with true respect and religious devotion and love as his children. The example of Christ while here on earth, in his mighty conflict with "the elements of this world," show the true relation we sustain to God as his children; so, too, in the prayers of Christ, and in the prayer he taught us to pray is the same principle manifest, it is one of divine worship, homage and love. It shows our resignation to the will of God in all things. See! "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is heaven." Here is true piety, devotion and worship, as taught by our Saviour.

Let us now look at the modern piety of these times. As an example we will introduce one of the most popular ministers of the cross of Christ (?) H. W. Beecher. On being asked his opinion of croquet-playing, says: "We think it is amusing to women, agreeable to men, and fascinating to ministers. For all persons who need gentle exercise it is even better than billiards; indeed, it is a kind of field billiards, or billiards gone to grass. Anybody that is too pious to play croquet ought to be done up in starched linen, put in a bag and hung up like a suit of Sunday clothes, and not let out until meeting time."

Here, now, we have it, and what what shall we do with it? A marked expression of true devotion! Is it not rather the quintessence of a false religion and "piety" to the God of this world—"lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God?"

Let us see. Christ says: "Men ought always to pray and not to faint." Mr. B. says no, don't be too pious; take a game at billiards. Christ says, pray that the will of God be done in earth as in heaven. Mr. B. says, play billiards. But, Mr. B., do they play billiards in heaven? Oh, don't be too pious, says B. But Christ says, "pray," "lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." Now, if these "billiards gone to grass" are so "fascinating to ministers," is there not temptation there? Can ministers or other Christians, who "pray always," "lead us not into temptation" engage in games of chance that are fascinating, and be consistent? Is it in keeping with the spirit of God? If it is why does Mr. Beecher say anything about one's being "too pious to play?" Does he not admit by that expression that one may be too pious to play? and, as piety simply means devotion to God as true worshipers, therefore one must lack that true devotion become a player of billiards or game of chance. Mr. Beecher writes his own condemnation in his words, "too pious to play," or he teaches that one can be saved by a little piety, or none at all, which is contrary to the spirit of the gospel. Out of his own mouth, then, is he condemned. Too pious to play billiards! Yes. I think Christ was, who agonized for the salvation of lost men until he sweat great drops of blood. I think the apostles and martyrs were, who suffered the loss of all things to win Christ and be found of him at his coming and kingdom.

But the religion of this age—the billiard religion—is not looking for the coming of Christ and his kingdom; and piety has no special merits. They need not pray, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as in heaven." The kingdom is in the soul, and the soul is immortal; and when this old body that plays the billiards is used up, this incomprehensible soul goes off to heaven never more to return. It is saved without a Saviour, and redeemed without a Redeemer—dependent not upon "God, who only hath immortality," for life everlasting, but has that independent of God; bowing to no sovereign higher than the sovereignty of man, or the spirit of some departed hero; faith is void, the conscience is quieted to sleep, his piety is to himself, he can have his own fun and frolic, or write fiction to pamper the passions of the ungodly world and fill his own pockets with that which drown men in perdition. Such is the spirit and work of some who profess to minister for Christ — representative men—but who scoff at his coming and deny the judgment at hand, expect to convert the world with that religion that lacks piety, at least enough to allow one to enter into temptation and play chance games with ungodly men equally yoked up. And any man who may dare devote himself to God, with a devotion that forbids his participating in such vain and foolish games, that man they sit in judgment upon; saying to the world, "Too pious, too pious!" he ought to be "done up in starched linen, put in a bag and hung up like a suit of Sunday clothes, and not let out until meeting time." Such is the scoffing in these days at devotion to our Father in heaven. It dishonors God; it dishonors Christ and the prophets and apostles. It is treading under foot the Son of God and doing despite to the spirit of grace. It is fulfilling the prophetic word, however, and clearly teaches the fact we are nearing the time when the chaff and the wheat will be separated by him who has the right and power, and will reign in glory and righteousness forever. Then the world will be made to know that "unless our righteousness shall exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees we shall in no case enter into the kingdom of God."

Home Influence.

If the father chiefly talks "money, money," at home, he generally rears a family in the worship of the almighty dollar. If he talks mainly horses, games, and races, he breeds a batch of sportsmen. If fashion is the family alter, then the children are offered up as victims upon that altar. If a man makes his own fireside attractive, he may reasonably hope to anchor his own children around it. My neighbor Q, makes himself the constant evening companion of his boys. The result is that his boys are never found in bad places. But, if a father hears the clock strike eleven in his club house or the play-house, he need not be surprised if his boys hear it strike twelve in the gaming-room or the drinking saloon. If he puts the bottle on his own table, he need not wonder if a drunken son staggers in, by and by, at his front door. When the best friend that childhood and youth ought to have becomes their foe, the home becomes the "starting-post" for moral ruin. CUYLER.

NEVER let your honest convictions be laughed down. Be ever ready to give respectful attention to argument.

The Christian Life.

The Oldest Christian Hymn.

IN Book III, of Clement of Alexandria, is given the most ancient hymn of the primitive church. It is there asserted to be of much earlier origin. It may have been sung by the "beloved disciple."

Shepherd of tender youth,
Guiding in love and truth,
Through devious ways;
Christ, our triumphant King!
We come thy name to sing,
And here our children bring,
To shout thy praise.

Thou art our holy Lord!
The all-subduing Word,
Healer of strife!
Thou didst thyself abase!
That from sin's deep disgrace
Thou mightest save our race,
And give us life.

Thou art wisdom's High Priest!
Thou hast prepared the feast
Of holy love,
And in our mortal pain
None calls on thee in vain;
Help thou dost not disdain,
Help from above.

Ever be thou our guide,
Our shepherd and our pride,
Our staff and song.

Resurrection.

We ought to thank God not only for the resurrection, but also for the hope of it, which can comfort the afflicted soul, and bid us be of good cheer concerning the departed, for they will again rise and be with us. If we must have anguish, we should mourn and lament over those who are living in sin, not over those who have died righteously. Thus did Paul; for he says to the Corinthians—Lest when I come to you God shall humble me among you and I shall bewail many. He was not speaking of those who had died, but of those who had sinned and had not repented of the lasciviousness and uncleanliness which they had committed; over these it was proper to mourn. So likewise another writer admonishes, saying, "Weep over the dead, for the light has failed; and weep over the fool for understanding has failed." (Eccles. 22; 10). Weep a little for the dead; for he has gone to his rest; but the fool's life is a greater calamity than death. And surely if one devoid of understanding is always an object of lamentation, much more he who is devoid of righteousness and that has fallen from hope toward God. These, then, let us bewail; for such bewailing may be useful. For often while lamenting these, we amend our own faults; but to bewail the departed is senseless and hurtful. Let us not, then, reverse the order, but bewail only sin; and all other things, whether poverty, or sickness, or untimely death, or calumny, or false accusation, or whatever human evil befalls us, let us resolutely bear them all. For these calamities, if we are watchful, will be the occasions of adding to our crowns. —Chrysostom.

"LET ME PRAY FIRST."—A little girl was passing through the streets a short time since, when she came to the spot where several idle boys were amusing themselves by the dangerous habit of throwing stones. Not observing her, one of the boys, by accident, threw a stone which struck her in the eye.

She was carried home in great agony. The surgeon was sent for, and a very painful operation declared necessary. When the time came, and the surgeon had taken out his instruments, she lay in her father's arms, and he asked if she was ready.

"No, father, not yet," she replied.

"What do you wish to wait for, my child?"

I want to kneel and pray to Jesus first," she answered. She prayed a few minutes, and afterwards submitted to the operation with the patience of a woman.

As the strings of an instrument make no melody till they be struck, or as the birds in spring sing most sweetly, when it rains most sadly, so sufferings draw forth the activity, beauty, and fragrance of a Christian's graces.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, September 16, 1873

OUR thanks are due the Rev. Edward White, of England, for the new tracts on the "Life and Death Theme," just received.

BR. S. C. WELLCOME has received twenty-seven members into the Monticello (Minn.) church since he became its pastor. He is doing a good work.

AN umbrella was taken from Br. Bosley's tent, by mistake, at the Wyanet camp-meeting. Let it be sent to Mrs. E. C. Donahue, Wyanet, Ill.

IF our friends will do as well next week in sending in pledges and donations, as they have done this week, you will hear but little more about the debt that has so long attracted attention.

SOME of our brethren are far too lengthy in their letters and reports of meetings. We hate to cut them down, but must do so if they persist in writing long letters. One quarter of a column is long enough to say all that is said in a whole column. Give us your thoughts in fewer words.

CONFERENCE and other meeting reports would be read with more interest if they were condensed to one-quarter their ordinary length, giving only the pith, leaving out all that would be only of local interest. No matter who preached, prayed and exhorted, but what was the result? How many were converted? How many were baptized? Let the story be short and sweet.

A MISTAKE CORRECTED. — Many friends from various Northern States have sent for the "Disembodied State," for free distribution at our expense. Our offer related only to the South. These calls will take all that we can afford to send free. They are kept for sale by the Society at 10 cents per copy, or $1.00 per dozen, by mail. Direct such orders to our office, at 25 West Lake street, and not to our private residence in Brodhead, Wis.

AT the Wyanet (Ill.) camp-meeting seven were baptized, several were converted and reclaimed, and some of the social meetings were excellent. It was our privilege to greet a goodly number of ministers living in the State, besides Br. Hastings from Boston, and Br. A. N. Seymour from Michigan, with his wife, who is an able minister, having preached for many years. Br. and Sr. Seymour anticipate settling in Illinois. Br. Hastings will return home, soon after the close of the Iowa camp-meeting.

ON our way to the Wyanet camp-meeting, we spent a short time in Aurora, and went to the Baptist (colored) meeting. Found them far more intelligent than the colored people of the South. In their theology they pattern closely after the views of the white churches around them, but in their devotion they are far in advance, praying with great fervor, weeping with broken hearts, and singing with spirit. We heard them sing their favorite hymn, containing the words—

"When I get on my golden shoes."

WE should be glad to receive short letters from every part of the field—east, west, north and south—giving the state of the cause, personal experience, and various items of interest. But let each writer be brief. Twenty short letters might be put into the space sometimes occupied by four or five long ones, and be far more profitable to our readers. Do not refrain from writing because inexperienced; if you have an item of good news for the household, state it briefly, and it can be put in shape.

THE Belleville (Wis.) camp-meeting, though not one of our largest, was characterized by the best of feelings, and good results. Many heard the truth with deep interest, and several witnessed for Christ for the first time. Brn. Howard, Dyson, Graves, Barber, and other ministering brethren greeted us on the ground, and helped in the meetings. Our social meetings were seasons of special interest. At a session of our quarterly conference, held on the ground September 12, Brn. A. M. Barber and A. M. Glading received license to preach under the sanction of the conference. We need more laborers. May the Lord of the harvest send many more into the field with hearts baptized with love divine.

BR. L. C. COLLINS, the former Editor of THE TIMES, has just moved into his new residence, opposite the Press building, which has been put up and finished, with out buildings complete, since his removal to Norwood last April, under the excellent management of Br. B. F. Butler, of Minnesota, who is indeed a workman that "needeth not to be ashamed." The location is the best in the place; the large bay-window looking out upon the artificial lake, with its island covered with trees, as also the park with its evergreens, flowers and sparkling fountain. The residence itself, for elegance, style of finish and convenience is superior to any in Norwood. We congratulate our good brother and his interesting family upon the possession of such a home. May they long live to enjoy the work of their hands, and when the Saviour comes to restore all things, may they inherit a richer mansion in a world of unfading glory.

God's Confirmed Covenant.

Says Paul: "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was [given] 430 years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance [promised to Abraham] be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore, then, serveth the law? It was added because of transgression, till the seed [Christ] should come to whom the promise was made." (Gal. 3: 17–19.)

Notice these facts here set forth:

1. This covenant to give Abraham and his seed an "inheritance," could not refer to a temporal inheritance, for the "Seed" was not to take possession till after the "law" had reached the end of its allotted time.

2. The "law" did not begin till 430 years after the promise of the inheritance was given. Both the 430 years, and the entire length of the law, were to precede the coming of the "Seed," to whom the "inheritance" was to be given.

God promised to Abraham both a "Seed," and a "Land," to be possessed jointly by himself and his promised "Seed," even "forever." "And the Lord said to Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy Seed forever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee." (Gen. 13: 14–17.)

In reading this promise, the following facts should be kept in mind:

1. The "Seed" to whom this promise is to be fulfilled, is not the carnal offspring of Abraham, but indicates primarily Christ, the great heir of Abraham, and secondly, the multitudinous seed through Christ, on the principle of faith. "Now, to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy Seed, which is Christ." (Gal. 3:16.) "And if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs, according to the promise." (Gal. 3:29.) "It is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ." (Eph. 3:6.) "Know ye, therefore, that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham.... So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." (Gal. 3:7–9.) Thus it is evident that when this promise receives its fulfillment, it will be fulfilled to Abraham and Christ, together with all who are Christ's, and not to Abraham's blood relatives who are not of faith.

2. It was not fulfilled during Abraham's life-time. "And he gave him none inheritance in it; no, not so much as to set his foot on; yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his Seed [Christ] after him, when as yet he had no child." (Acts 7:5.) Nor was it fulfilled to Abraham's descendants. "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise." (Heb. 11:9.) Thus, while Isaac and Jacob dwelt in the land, instead of being possessors, they were simply "heirs." As these "heirs" died without having the promise fulfilled to them, it is certain that it cannot be fulfilled till they live again; and that will not be till Christ returns from heaven to raise the sleeping saints.

3. This promise was not limited to the land of Canaan, but embraced the [illegible] "For the [illegible] be the heir of the world [kosmos] was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith." (Rom. 4: 13.) Here, then, is a promise which embraces "THE WORLD," which has not been fulfilled, and which must be fulfilled to Abraham, Christ, and all who belong to Christ by faith.

This same promise of "land" was renewed to Abraham under oath, to which reference is made by the Lord in reiterating the promise to Isaac—"Unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father." (Gen. 26: 3.) This "oath" of Jehovah was given under these circumstances. When God renewed the promise of "land" to Abraham to "inherit," Abraham said, "Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" (Gen. 15: 8.) God then commanded Abraham to prepare for the administering of an oath, after the custom of that day, which was to divide a beast in the midst; and the one taking the oath marched between those pieces, thus virtually saying, Let me thus be if I fail to fulfill my covenant. Said God to Abraham: "Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she-goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle and a young pigeon. And he took unto him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another." The preparation having thus been made for taking the four-fold oath, God places Abraham in trance, and informs him that neither he nor his seed should receive the land for a long time. "And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him. And he said unto Abram, know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years.... And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age." Here, before the oath is taken, Abraham is informed that his posterity must be bondmen before possessing the land, even as a temporal inheritance, and he himself must die before he could receive the inheritance. Being thus prepared to see that a temporal inheritance is not meant, God proceeds to administer the oath: "And it came to pass when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces." (Gen. 15:17.) Here God appeared to Abraham, not as he appeared to Moses, in a flame of fire in the bush, but in a "burning lamp," passing between the pieces, thus taking the four-fold oath, by which he virtually said to Abraham, let me die if I fail to fulfill my promise to give you the land. Though the land has not been given yet, and though Abraham and other "heirs" are dead, God's four-fold oath will be fulfilled; and all who belong to Christ by faith will share the fulfillment with Abraham at the resurrection of the just.

Zachariah's Prophecy.

BR. SHELDON.—I am requested by some of the brethren in this region to ask you for an exposition of Zachariah's prophecy, contained in the 14th chapter. They wish to rightly understand it, and if you will please write your views for publication, you will very much oblige your brother in the Lord,

C. H. WILLIAMS.

West Martinsburg, N. Y.

REPLY.

We apply the three first verses of this chapter to the day of the Lord's temporal wrath upon Jerusalem in the time of Antiochus, which was the first invasion of this city after the prophecy was uttered, and the one which it might be expected to refer to, unless good reasons could be shown for overleaping the first invasion, to depict a future one. Our reasons for this view are, that the facts agree with the prediction. According to history, Antiochus "slew eighty thousand persons," and also "took forty thousand prisoners, and sold as many into slavery." This agrees with the prediction: After a great slaughter "the city should be taken." Then "half of the city should go forth into captivity," which was true to the letter; "and the residue of the people should not be cut off," but were taken as prisoners, and held in their own land, instead of going into captivity after the city was taken. This comprised the whole colony. Swine's flesh was then offered upon their altars. After being thus conquered by their enemies, the people began to reflect upon their great sin in departing from the living God, and heartily repented before heaven. Finally, under the Maccabees, God fought their battles for them "as in the days of old," conquering all the nations that had been gathered against Jerusalem by Antiochus, namely: "the Idumeans, the Bainites, the Amonites, the Syrophenicians, the nations east of the Jordan," etc. God helped his people after they had duly repented, to repel these nations, who had thus ruined their city, in fulfillment of prophecy. It was a great triumph.

From the 4th to the 12th verse, the prophet evidently glances forward to the future world, and gives us a description of a scene yet to come, instead of giving a consecutive prophecy. Right here is where many introduce confusion into the prophecy by overlooking this fact. From the 4th to the 12th verse is a vivid prediction of the coming restitution, instead of being a continuation of the preceding prediction. With this view all is plain.

Then, at the 12th verse, the prophet turns his attention to a description of the overthrow of Jerusalem's foes, and the elevation of Israel over the nations; all of which was based upon underlying conditions, like every national promise, and which would have been fulfilled if the conditions had been complied with, but could not be fulfilled on any other terms without a repudiation of God's own conditions.

Moses had long before laid down these conditions, and no prophet could disregard them: "It shall come to pass if thou wilt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God.... that the Lord thy God will set thee on high ABOVE ALL NATIONS OF THE EARTH.... The Lord shall CURSE thine enemies that rise up against thee. .... And ALL PEOPLE OF THE EARTH shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord; and they shall be AFRAID of thee.... And the Lord shall make thee the HEAD, and not the tail; and thou shalt be ABOVE only, and thou shalt not be beneath; IF that thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God." (Deut. 28:1–13.) Zachariah's prediction of Israel's elevation would have been realized after the victory of the Maccabees, in an age of sacrifices, if the conditions had been complied with, and they would have been the "head" of the nations, and all would ultimately have gone up to Jerusalem from year to year; and curses would have fallen heavily on their foes. But God could not be true to himself and have carried out this arrangement without first having the conditions met. The same conditions are again specified in these words: "At what instant I speak concerning a NATION and concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it; IF it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good wherewith I said I would benefit them." (Jer. 18:9.) This condition underlies every national promise, like that in Zachariah's prophecy. God cannot fulfill such promises of national greatness, and national elevation, if the underlying conditions are disregarded. How was it after the victories of the Maccabees? They soon relaxed into sin. From Moses' time to the end of the law, they never lived out the conditions; hence, the day has gone by for the fulfillment of promises that might have been fulfilled in an age of sacrifices and feasts of tabernacles; and Israel will never thus stand at the head of the nations. They did "do evil," and God said that if they did he would NOT fulfill his promise to them. There the matter stands to-day: "I WILL repent of the good wherewith I said I would benefit them." If they really did do evil, and God really did repent, or turn from his purpose to benefit them, then he certainly will not rescind his own decision. They will not hereafter stand where Moses and Zachariah said they might stand—high above the nations in an age of sacrifices—for they have forfeited their claim, and the only age adapted to this arrangement has long since passed away, never to return.

"Sensual—Having not the Spirit."

Jude speaks of a class in his day whose religion lacked the vitalizing power of the Holy Spirit, and whom he compared to "clouds without water," "trees whose fruit withereth," "wandering stars" not kept by the proper attraction within proper limits; and he adds: "These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the spirit." Could a truer description be given of the majority of professors at the present day? And are not many of our own people in the same dilemma? What will a profession avail those who have not the spirit? And how can we have the spirit without bearing its fruit? If we allow carnality to predominate here, it will shut us out of the kingdom hereafter. "To be spiritually minded is life and peace." Are we temples for the Holy Ghost? "If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch." How many such leaders are zealously at work to lead the people, not even dreaming that they are blind themselves. But their honesty does not remove the ditch to which they are tending. We have the eye-salve of truth, and must be active ing it. If the leaders spurn it, who are being led, that they whither they are tending, be- ng engulfed in ruin. Often, lignity and official responsi- fellow-officials, leads men in honor to so far forget their bility to God that they are inaccessible to his truth. It the days of Jesus, when "the people heard him gladly." uch circumstances, carry the the common people. Get them and then to read. Let every keep a few tracts on hand for ose. Do not fear a little cost.

Men and Beasts.

H. WILLETT.

n hear the complaint that the teach that man is no better ast. I have never yet heard tist say that man was never to be better than a beast; but ard them teach that man had inence above a beast, whilst of death: which position I fully sustained by the Script- a people we profess to adhere chings of the Bible, both the the New Testaments. But do you mean to say that you it reads, all in a literal sense? we take it as it reads, cer- d try to get the sense. But ne the local meaning of words than one signification in the , we should never lose e subject and just relation of to the theme. With this ling, which I believe will be by linguists to be a correct f interpretation, let us hear man, or Bible preacher, (Ecc. "I said in mine heart con- e estate of the sons of men, might manifest them, and might see that they them- beasts; for that which be- sons of men befalleth beasts, thing befalleth them: as the so dieth the other; yea, they e breath: so that a man hath nence above a beast: for all All go unto one place; all dust, and all turn to dust There is nothing in the above that could be construed in a sense, without doing violence of language. The theme is ity of man, equally with that sts. A declaration in plain he nature of man: a state- e element out of which he d, (see Gen. 2: 7,) and of his dust again in death. annot justly be any equivo- o the subject matter spoken neither good nor bad char- held up to view in this in- the end of all men to return to dust, the term beast, when applied to man in this connection must be understood as referring to actual facts, concerning man and the beast, and the relation he sustains with the beast in his dissolution. No more, no less. Hence not figurative, but literal in this case at least.

But, says one, the finality is different in death in the case of the man from that of the beast. It is admitted that the dust returns to the earth as it was, but (see v. 21,) "who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" And again, (Ecc. 12:7,) "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." In both these cases a description of the decease or decay and dissolution of man is given regardless of character; neither good nor bad character is set forth, but man as a sample of the whole race, or mankind in general, so that if the spirit of man proper, the good and the bad go to the same place, both go to God and we are compelled to leave them there, without distinction of character or condition, by the declaration of the preacher at least. The declaration in Ecc. 12:7 however is not that the veritable man returns unto God who gave him, but the spirit, or the it that God gave him (man).

It is very plainly stated that man was formed of the dust of the ground, and that all he received afterward was the breath of life, (see Gen. 2:7,) hence it is very harmonious with the subject to conclude that the "it" that returns to God is nothing more nor less than the breath of life, or principle of life, or spirit of life first received, as the Psalmist declares (146:4) in regard to man, that "his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." It there is no thought in death on the part of the man wherein then is there a difference of condition between the man and the beast? for we have found out already that they all have one breath, and all turn to dust. We are informed by the Scriptures that God is the God of the spirits of all flesh.–(See Num. 16:22.) If so be that the spirits of all flesh return unto him as conscious living things, they all go to the one place, hence no pre-eminence again over the beast. But the query (Ecc. 3:21), who knoweth the spirit of man (not that man becomes spirit) that goeth upward (Septuagint, whether goeth upward) and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth? I understand as an interrogation.

And as men and beasts have all one breath, and all die alike, and all go unto one place, all return to dust, and it is declared that a man has no pre-eminence above a beast in all these respects, neither can I discover that he has any pre eminence in regard to the spirit, in this connection: for it is declared that there is the "spirit" of the beast as well as the "spirit" of man and I would ask too, who knoweth whether there is a difference of the finality in regard to the spirit of man or the spirit of the beast, although the one may go upward and the other downward to the earth, according to organization or posture of the two creatures. With these statements of the Scriptures before us, we can understand the strength of the declarations of other portions more fully. (See 1 Cor. 15:13.)—"But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen." But the hope of the resurrection is held out to encourage the heart of man through the Scriptures: and Paul testifies in vv. 22, 23, "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive; but every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming."

The pre-eminence of man above the beast is in the resurrection, provided they are Christ's at his coming. Hear the words of the Savior (John 11:25), "Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Again, (in John 5:28, 29,) "Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Here is a promise by the Savior himself to the good class of mankind that they shall be resurrected to life. But on the other, hand they that have done evil let us hear the testimony of Peter, (2 Pet. 2,) "But these, as the natural brute beasts made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption." This is very evidently the finality of certain vile characters as set forth by Peter; that they as brute beasts will perish as such: because as the Savior said, they come not forth unto life, but unto damnation. How much pre-eminence then hath the vile, the beastly, over the brute beast, either in this world, in death, or in the resurrection, viewed in the light of the Bible?

Public Schools and Public Character.

It was a remark of Daniel Webster "mere intellect is nugatory. It may be cultivated to almost any extent without materially improving the character or benefiting the heart." The following from an address by John Hancock, superintendent of the public schools of Cincinnati supports a like sentiment. Moral and religious instruction can never have less than the highest place in the education of youth.

"It is a favorite theory that our public schools are to convert the great mass of our youth into good citizens. No amount of intellectual training will accomplish this. If the springs of moral action are not touched, the result at any rate will be but a partial and unsatisfactory one. The truth is everywhere recognized that to form character it is far more important that the child's emotional and moral nature should be reached than that his mind should be well stored with knowledge.

But, notwithstanding the general recognition of this truth, in the certain means of doing this we are making no very considerable progress. The young teacher hesitates to take hold of the matter, either fearing that it is one too difficult for him, or that his lecturing on moral duties might savor too much of cant. He needs, I think, but to feel assured that the virtues of gentleness, kindness, forgiveness, self-denial, self-control, temperance, courage, honesty, and truthfulness, can be as easily cultivated by a little care and ingenuity on his part, and with results just as certain, as can the faculties of memory, judgment, etc., to be induced to set about the great work. As the moral status of a community must always greatly depend upon its public schools, moral instruction in them ought not alone to be incidental, but should have its specific time assigned to it, as in any other branch. To make such a course practical and sure in its results is environed, from its very nature with great difficulties, but not necessarily with insuperable ones. At any rate it is worth while to make a trial."—Sel.

GRACIOUS HEARTS reflect most upon themselves; they do not seek so much what to reprove in others, as what to amend in themselves; they love to look inward, and, being sensible of their own failings, are tender in reflecting on the weaknesses of others: whereas those that are most inquisitive into the lives of others are usually most careless in reforming their own.

AT HOME.

—Benjamin H. Atkins, aged 53 years, hanged himself in Lynn, Mass. He leaves a wife and two children.

—The corner stone of the new church edifice of the Old South Society, at the corner of Boylston and Dartmouth streets, Boston, was laid yesterday in presence of a large gathering

—There has been frost at a number of places throughout Illinois and Iowa, but so far as heard from not sufficient to do any material damage.

—It is said that Senator Ferry, of Michigan, will be elected temporary president of the United States Senate, instead of Senator Carpenter —Archbishop McCloskey, it is reported, is about to establish a daily paper in New York, with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars.

—CAPT. JACK, Black Jim, Boston Charley, Schonchin Bamchon, One eyed Jim and Slo luke, Modoc Indians concerned in the murder of Gen. Camby and Dr. Thomas, have been sentenced to be hung on October 3d.

—The total amount of tea consumed annually in the United States is 50,000,000 pounds, of which 20,000,000 is green tea of various discriptions, about 5,000,000 Oolong, and the remainder Japan.

—MR CHARLES BERRR, a student preparing for the Methodist ministry, at Casenovia, N. Y., was drowned on the lake on the 9th, of August, while attempting to rescue a young lady.

—The Rev. Charles H. Tucker, who was for a time assistant at Christ Church, Brooklyn, and came to Chicago more than a year since to join Mr. Cheney, has been deposed by the bishop of Long Island.

—THE U. P. Presbytery of Cleveland has voted to recommend the envelope system as the best method of raising church funds, as they find that the subscription system tends to destroy personal responsibility and pew renting disturbs the peace and harmony of congregations.

—There has been quite a flurry at Madison, Wisconsin, over the enforcement of the Sabbath law. The movement reached only the whiskey sellers, but the proprietors of saloons insisted it should be carried out to the letter, and the citizens determined so too. Cigar stores and soda stands have no more right to violate the law than liquor saloons.

—Among the several projects in monuments in Central Park New York are those for the erection of the statues of the Hon Wm. H. Seward, Daniel O'Connell, Elias Howe, Jr., Robert Burns, and Kosciusco. The means for the erection of the statues of Messrs. Steward and Howe have been secured, subscriptions are being received for those of O'Connell and Burns, and a subscription is about being started for Kosciusco.

—The Missionary Training Institute, known as the Bethany Institute, located at No. 69 Second Avenue, New York, under the direction of Rev. and Mrs. A. G. Ruliffson, is now commencing his fall session. It is the plan of the institution to receive under its care ladies who desire to prepare for some branch of either City or Foreign Missionary Work. Any desiring to enter the Institute, or wishing information concerning its aims, should apply at once to the above address.

—A very large number of persons, old and young, suffer in health from inhaling coal gases in city and country during the winter months. Whenever the slightest odor is perceived in a dwelling, instant vigilance should be exercised, and the cause removed at once. It is a bad plan to put coal upon a fire in furnace or stove, just before retiring at night. The gaseous products, especially the sulphurous acid, are more copious for an hour or two afterward, and consequently more dangerous. It should be a rule in every family, that some trusty person should examine the heating apparatus carefully before retiring each night. In dull, damp, moderate weather, the danger is greater, and the supervision should be more thorough.

—Difficulty occurred at Murphysboro, Jackson County, Ill., in which Mr. Henry Boucher, a well known and prominent Democratic politician of that place, was shot and dangerously wounded. It seems that on the afternoon of the day mentioned there was a wrestling match at Murphysboro, in which a young man named Smith was one of the contestants. Mr. Boucher was selected as referee, and gave his decision adversely to Smith. At this the father of the young man, Mr. Thomas O. Smith, became offended, and accused Boucher of unfair dealing. High words ensued, when Smith drew his revolver and shot Boucher through the left breast, inflicting a very painful and probably fatal wound. Smith was arrested and lodged in jail to await the result of Boucher's wound. —Cairo Bulletin.

A GRAND EXAMPLE FOR NATIONS.

The grandeur of the transaction which has just taken place at Washington between Britain and America is concealed by its simplicity. A simple exchange of two pieces of paper completed the payment by the former to the latter of the sum awarded for damages coming under the general title of Alabama claims, amounting to fifteen millions and a half dollars in gold. Britain had employed American bankers to purchase exchange and United States bonds, which they did from time to time, till the whole amount was deposited with the Treasury. For this a receipt was granted, and that receipt was formally rendered to the Secretary of State, who granted in lieu thereof the following receipt:

"The undersigned, Hamilton Fish, Secretary of States of the United States of America, hereby declares that he has this day received from the Right Honorable Sir Edward Thornton her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, and from Edward Mortimer Archibald, Esq., her Britannic Majesty's Consul General at New York agents of her Majesty's Government in this behalf, the sum of $15,500,000 in gold coin, being the whole amount of the gross sum awarded on the 14th of September, 1872, by the Tribunal of Arbitration then sitting at Geneva, in accordance with this provision of our seventh article of the Treaty of May 8, 1871, between the said United States and her Britannic Majesty.

"In witness whereof the aforesaid Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States of America, has subscribed his name to this receipt in duplicate at Washington, this 9th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1873.

"HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State."

The Treasury certificate was then returned and changed into a bond for the same amount, bearing five per cent interest, being part of the United States funded loan payable in 1881. This bond is held in trust for the payment of the claims against the fund.

Thus happily concluded, upon peace principles and by friendly arbitration, one of the most difficult and irritating questions that can arise between nations; a question which for years threatened to culminate in war, one day of which would have cost each nation more than the whole amount of reward. What a triumph of peace this is, and how fraught with good results as a precedent in future!—New York Witness.

—THE Spanish Cortes has refused by a vote of 119 nays to 43 yeas, to grant amnesty to the insurgents.

—The King of Holland formally opened the new docks at Flushing. The ceremonies were witnessed by an immense concourse of citizens of all classes.

—At a late demonstration of the trades unionists at Edinburg, 15,000 men were in procession. The object of the demonstration, was to protest against the criminal law amendment act.

—A Spanish correspondent of the Standard, states that five men sent from Madrid to assassinate Don Carlos have been executed at Estella. The Republicans are casting guns for the defence of San Sebastian.

—A special dispatch from Berlin to the London Hour says the Prussian Government has desided to recognize Bishop Reinkens. Baden and Bavaria will follow the example of Prussia.

—The French Government has received notification from Berlin and France, having fulfilled all her engagements, the occupation of her territory by the German forces is legally ended. The vacuation of Verdun by the Germans has begun.

OF the English bishops fourteen graduated at Cambridge and twelve at Oxford. Of those appointed by Mr. Gladstone five are High Church, two Low Church and one (Dr. Browne, just elevated to the Diocese of Winchester), "colorless."

—The Rev. George Rose, formerly vicar of Earls Heaton, near Dewsbury, having seceded from the Established Church, in consequence of the "Bennett Judgment," has been baptized at the Metropolitan Tabernacle by Mr. J. A. Spurgeon as a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ.

—Some interesting figures are published in a trade paper relative to the circulation of London newspapers The Daily Telegraph takes the lead with a daily circulation of 170,000 copies; the Standard follows with 140,000; the Daily News has 90,000: the Echo 90,000; and the Times 70,000. The morning and evening papers of London altogether give a sum total of 569,000 copies.

—The square of buildings known as Plaza Vapor, Havanna was reduced to ashes. The fire broke out simultaneously in the four corners of the square, and is supposed to have been the work of incendiaries. The loss is estimated at over $8,000,000. It is reported that twenty lives were lost. The scenes around the burning square were exciting and terrible. Parents threw their children from the balconies to save them from the flames.

—A conference of European and American jurisconsults, which has been in session in Ghent, Belgium during the week, has organized as a permanent Institute of international law. Three subjects have been discussed, viz., international arbitration, the three rules of the Washington Treaty and the codification and adoption by treaty of regulations relative to private property in time of war. The Conference appointed a committee to draw up and issue a manifesto, and adjourned to meet in Geneva next year.

—John Simon, medical officer of the Privy Council, London, says the great danger of cholera is found in water supplies, tainted even the least by filtration from sewers, drains, cesspools, privies, marshes, ditches or the like. This danger is often found in wells, sometimes in the waterworks for the supply of cities. The second great danger is breathing air which is foul with the effluvia of the same kind of impurity. These also are precisely the chief sources of typhus and other fevers.

—The office of chancellor of the duchy of Cornwall England which John Bright takes on re-entering the Gladstone cabinet, carries with it the right of "presenting" or appointing the rectors of no less than forty-one Cornish Episcopal parishes. He proudly declared himself, in the house of commons once, to be a "dissenter of dissenters; yet it will now be his duty to supply Cornish churchmen with their spiritual instructors. Moreover, these are life appointments, and Mr. Bright will be able to give a prevailing color to the Cornish clergy, whether of low church, broad church, or high church. His dislike of all sacerdotalism will leave but small chance to the latter section of the church, and it is reasonable to believe that he will be more inclined to favor the Evangelicals who approach nearest the line which divides dissent from the state church. The anomaly is, that a dissenting Quaker should hold the power to supply clergymen to an alien religious act.

"All Hands on Deck."

The new volume of The Times has just begun, and with it begins the season better suited for reflective reading.—The busier season drawing to a close affords more opportunity; and the more lukewarm of us "wait for an opportunity" to do what we know to be but duty, while the more zealous "seek opportunity." But now the waiting should cease, and all hands go to work. Just now more than ever should we make an extra effort to increase the list of readers to The Times. Already there are no less than twenty thousand persons reading it from week to week, and were this army to set about the work in a manner becoming earnest Christians, what mighty results could be shortly accomplished.

If you can only get them to take it on trial for three or six months, by continually having it by them they become accustomed to looking it over and occasionally reading some of the articles, until by degrees they become interested, a little at first until finally—unless they are blind, bigoted and superstitious—they come to love the light gleaming from its pages. If we have the light of the gospel it should shine—shine continually, always and every where that we can induce men to behold its brightness.

Now let all hands lay hold of this work with a determination—with double diligence—and give one long, steady pull, such as will roll up at least double the names now on the list. We are nearing the shore, and what is done must not be delayed but accomplished immediately. Come! lay hold! it can be done, but not without your help. In united effort there is a wonderful power!

I feel much interest in the W. A. C. Pub Society, but being one of the poor ones, I can only add my mite, two dollars enclosed with best wishes and prayers, that all our brethren may be faithful and help to sustain and circulate the good news of the kingdom of God, according to their means.

From V. Hunt, Kansas.

To the brethren and sisters who sent me tracts and papers for free distribution, in response to the call made in the A. C. Times and Crisis by me, let me say you have my heartfelt thanks. I received a large number of which I sent two packages to Eld. J. C Smith to circulate with the tent.

To Br Wm W. Cates

You are requested to call on the Greenland church as you return from Iowa—if it is convenient, stop and preach for us. Let us know by letter or notice in The Times. Call on the undersigned, six miles northwest of Stewartsville, DeKalb County, Mo.

In behalf of the church.

J. F. Nicholson.

From Eld. J. W. Burroughs, New Hartford, Iowa.

Br. Sheldon: The continued appeals, and earnest effort which you are putting forth in The Times for help, seems to call on me as well as others, to assist you in the great work which you have undertaken, i. e., to blot out a debt of four thousand dollars

My dear brother, I believe that it could be done, if the brethren were united, but without a united action the paper cannot be maintained.

From J. Luttrell, Montreal.

As you dislike long introductory remarks I at once proceed to state: Notwithstanding the opposition here from the so-called religious press and the teachers of religion, the Lord has a witness for himself here who are trying to remind the people, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." We have had times of great trial. Discussions and disunion even amongst our own brethren, but the Spirit of the Anointed One has again united us, and the light shineth. We had a visit from Eld. C. Pike a few weeks ago, which was made a great blessing to us, in bringing together and uniting in one, what was two congregations, and love and peace continue since. We find how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. Pray for the little flock here that we may continue steadfast unto the end.

From T. F. Fry.

Dear brethren and sisters of like precious faith: I still read The Times and long for its arrival. I like it because it speaks the truth of God's Word boldly. I like to read the letters from dear brethren and sisters scattered abroad. Some may like to hear from us. We are in southwest Missouri. We came here five years ago, but had no preaching of like precious faith till last February. We wrote to Br. Cate and he came and preached the word of life, and organized a church of eight. Came back in March and there were added to the church ten persons, and still they come. He is with us every second Saturday and Sunday. We number twenty-nine now. Interest still good. To God be all the glory. Can't some brother come over and help us? We live four and a half miles north of Nevada City, and if any brother could give us a call, we would be glad, for there is a large field here. Br. Cate has more calls than he can fill. Pray for us, that we may be ready when the Master comes.

From W. Lunsford, St. Mary's, Mo.

This is truly a missionary field. We that believe the advent doctrine are scattered about, there being no preacher nor church. I believe great good could be done if we could get a preacher. I am the only one that has introduced your works here. There are many who would like to have the opportunity of being baptized. This is a fine location, if any of your preaching brethren would like to come on a visit or take up his abode with us, let them correspond with me.

I am doing all I can to help on the march of truth. I would say to you, send out a quantity of your publications to your friends, let them sell and return the money. Let each and every one get subscribers for the paper. In this way all can do something for the cause. I have a large family and am not much related to the Rothchilds, yet I must not deny the faith, but will do more if I can before the time comes.

From E. G. Salisbury, Sullivan Co., Pa.

Dear brethren and sisters in Christ, heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ of the kingdom, to you one and all I send greeting:

It is written in the Scriptures, "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard it and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels: and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him."

We can speak to one another through the paper if no other way, and I would say to you all in the words of our Lord and Savior, "Little children, love one another," and again in the words of Peter, "Seeing ye have purified yourselves in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently, being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible by the Word of God which liveth and abideth for ever."

From W. P. Thorp, West Creek, Republic Co., Kansas

Br. Sheldon: As it is seldom that the readers of The Times hear from the little band of believers at West Creek, I thought I would send you a few lines about them. It is some five months since our good Br. Bliss organized a church at this place with about ten members. We hope there will be two or three more added this fall We have kept up a prayer meeting on Sunday afternoons through the summer, but have had but little preaching as yet. There has been much opposition in the past; but thanks to God, there is not quite so much now, still it pains my heart to say there is much yet. The most of our church seem to be doing the best they can, but they are all poor, and it is but little they can do.

We need some more earnest workers, persons who are grown up, and can take the lead so that the younger ones will follow. But let us hope for the best, looking to God for the blessing, believing that he will grant it in his own good time, and build up, and strengthen this church to his name's honor and glory.

From Mary Tritton, Bangor, Wis.

I send you two dollars, one dollar you can use for the debt and the other you may credit us on The Times. Perhaps some may say if I can send only one dollar I had rather not send anything. If every one should say so the debt would never be paid. The poor widow cast her mite into the treasury. How many of us are willing to do as much as she, even to cast in all our living. Will we have it said to us, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these, ye have done it unto me? Jesus is coming soon, and yet how few believe it, and it will take them unawares as it did the antediluvians; "They knew not until the flood came and took them all away." This seems to be the character of the times in which we live. Sinners are growing harder and more bold in sin. We look over our fields and we see the grain is harvested and the wheat and the chaff is being separated; so it will be in the end of this world. Soon the angel will thrust his sickle into the earth and gather the vine of the earth and cast it into the wine press of the wrath of God.—(Rev. 14:19.) Do we realize it as we should? O, may we all awake from this lethargy and come up on higher grounds, so that when he comes we may hear him say, "well done, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

From J. R. Deputy, Volga, Ind.

I have felt a desire for some time to be remembered and numbered among those scattered ones of like precious faith, a peculiar people, worshiping a real God, seeking immortality through the righteousness of faith expecting to be crowned at the coming of Christ and his kingdom. I am quite young in the growth of Christ, coming in at a late hour of the day into the nobleman's vineyard. I feel it my duty to be a faithful and obedient servant, looking to God for strength that can enable me to win the prize of eternal life, and become joint possessor with Abraham and Christ of the new earth.

These blessed promises were made manifest and clear to me by the plain teaching of Dr. N. Field, at Volga, last October, when I felt it my duty to repent, confess Christ before men, and be baptized, that he might not be ashamed to confess me before his father. I enlisted with the little flock at Volga, with a firm resolution that I would reform my evil ways and live with an eye single to the glory of God; and that I might be able to enter into the marriage feast of the Bride and the Lamb in the promised land of Israel in commemoration of the death, burial and resurrection of our Savior. Glorious reunion. Pray God that I may be remembered among them.

From A. J. Marsh, LaCrosse, Wis.

Dear Br. Sheldon: Br. P. W. Hough has just closed a series of meetings in this city, held in the large tent. Preached fourteen sermons in all, having good attention given by those who were in to hear, though the number was small for a city of this size. Quite a number came night after night, and we think were favorably impressed with the truth; and before long good fruit will come of the seed sown, for the Lord has said his word should not return to him void, and commanded his servants to preach it. And thus in faith and obedience Br. Hough, with us, discharged his duty to this people, warning them of the impending judgment, and exhorting them to be ready to meet the Lord. Faithfully was error exposed, and the glorious gospel set forth instead. But the mass passed us by with indifference, or ridicule and contempt. By a great majority of this people we are considered fanatics, and heretics; and they will not even condescend to give us a hearing. This city is almost wholly given over to the world. The churches are cold, proud and worldly, joining hands with the godless in their pleasures, consequently are powerless for good. Verily it reminds one of Noe's day and indicates that the end of the age is at hand, the people eating, drinking, etc., knowing not until the destruction is upon them, sweeping all before it.

A few [illegible] of us are trying to stand in these evil days, in this city, for Christ and the present truth; but the devil seems to be determined that we shall not succeed much, and at times we are almost discouraged in trying longer to make united public effort, thinking perhaps the city unworthy and that we have done all we ought to in that direction.

From Charlotte S. L. Sickendick. Iberia, Mo.

As I looked over our precious paper, The Times, I noticed a letter written by a dear sister who had just buried her little child while away from home, wishing for some friend to write her a few words of consolation through the paper, and I will try to write a few words for I can truly sympathise with a mother in affliction. I too have seen the earth close over two of my children; the first one a son of two years and eight months, and last year another son of eighteen years, who had been the help and comfort of his parents for several years; but alas like Abraham of old we are called upon to give up our Isaac, and I feel like saying this morning with Job, "the Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord." He has said that those whom he loveth he also chasteneth; he must needs try our faith to see if we are willing to say "not my will but thine O Lord be done." I am also afflicted with sore eyes, which has been my lot for over thirty years, and is a great burden to me, but I look forward to that glorious time when mortal shall put on immortality. A few more storms to brave, a few more battles to fight, and our trials will be over. Bless the Lord, and while I speak of my sorrows I will not forget to tell of my blessings. Our annual meeting commenced Aug. 9, and lasted eight days, during which time we were greatly refreshed, and many were interested. Different denominations joined in with us, working harmoniously together. Seven were baptized, among them my husband, myself and our only remaining son, aged sixteen. Br. Elliot preached to us and Srs. Prescott, from St. Louis, and Graham, besides a traveling Baptist preacher. The meeting being over, it was hard to take the parting hand, perhaps to meet no more till Jesus comes.

From C. E. Darrow.

I like the tone of Br. Field's article, as it has the ring of true metal, and I wish every subscriber of The Times would at once observe his solicitation. Then the debt would not only be paid, but a sufficient fund on hand to meet unexpected emergencies. There should be no Ananiases and Sapphiras in the apostolic camp, but let every one step forward now, Paul-like, and say, "I have kept back nothing that is profitable unto you." Unless we are determined to support the cause we love, other denominations may well say of us, "Their religion is like a rope of sand." Now is a good time for those who say so much about sanctification, or an entire consecration (and I love to hear it) to pay some of their vows unto the Lord. Let them show to the world that they are sincerely in earnest when they say they "have put all on the altar for the cause of Christ," for this means body, soul, pocket book and contents. It means all. This is sanctification. I well remember a little incident that happened a few years ago that well illustrates what I mean. A young man had just entered the ministry. He had a young wife, a little child and two long years of toil and study before his college course would be completed. His means were very limited, and finally became reduced down to the last dollar, and one day there came along a person soliciting aid for foreign missions. Other students of the school were contributing a dollar each for this purpose, and after consulting his wife whether he had better give the last dollar, something seemed to say to him, "trust all in the hands of the Lord." And in less than twenty-four hours from that time he was called out into the country to perform the marriage ceremony, for which he received ten dollars. Then said he, "The Lord has paid me ten-fold." Verily he that trusteth in the Lord shall "receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting."

From D. O. Ames, Fort Scott, Kan.

I have been quite lost since I left the tent and Brs. Smith and Bliss, but trust the Lord is doing a good work by them and the mission tent. May he speed the work of gospel truth. O, what a work there is to be done here in Kansas, and especially in Bourbon County. There are none of our faith here that I know of, but many inquiring after the truth. I have distributed tracts and papers, the people are anxious to read and hear the truth. I left an appointment at a school house where I spoke from Dan. 2 on the fulfilling of the prophecy and setting up of Christ's kingdom on this earth. Since then I have many invitations from other places. Some never heard of Adventists, and many questions are asked, and I find friends among the Seventh day Adventists. They are expecting a tent at Union Town under the charge of Br. Cook.

At one place where I spoke there was a good interest and I proposed to leave an appointment again if the people wished; the leader was a Methodist and did not answer, but two young men spoke up and requested I should leave an appointment, and I did so. I expect to meet some opposition, but Christ being my help and the truth maketh free to speak I am able to meet opposition. Dear brethren, there is a great call here for the gospel truth, and if I had the talent and the means I should devote all my time to the work; but I have to work for means, and study the Word and ask for wisdom. Pray for me.

In the last days scoffers shall arise, saying, Where is the promise of his coming, since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were." I am sorry to find them among my friends, who heed not the warning but go on rioting in pleasure, saying there is time yet, great things are to be done before the end; this they are willingly ignorant of. Oh, how truly every word shall be fulfilled! Dear brethren, shall we not look for Christ before the generation passes away that saw those signs? Amen. Even so come Lord Jesus.

From E. A. Marsh, Brookville, Adams Co., Iowa.

Dear brethren and sisters scattered abroad, greeting: May grace and peace from God our Father be with you. It is not often I write so you will not consider it trespassing upon your patience to read what I have written. It will be encouraging also to friends who have known me in the several states I have been in to learn that God's grace has been sufficient for me unto this time and has aided me in his work. By permission, I will briefly relate some of my experience since Nov. 2, 1871. Since that time I have traveled over 2,500 miles and preached in fifteen houses in Mo., in seven counties, and in eleven houses in Iowa, in six counties. Have also spoken at three places in the open air. Gave 127 discourses in that time and should have done much more but was hindered as many are by having but little aid outside of my own earnings. In that time have seen good done, and the churches built up, and have had large and attentive congregations. Have also enjoyed the blessing of God in having liberty while proclaiming his truth. The only question now is how much is duty?

I greatly desire to see the truth vindicated, and souls saved, but financial embarrassments intervene, and others alike circumstanced sympathize with me. Now, shall I continue on, and will you who love the truth aid me by your prayers, so that I may know how much the Lord would have me do? I have reason to think that others are in the same situation. They know it to be duty to labor in behalf of the churches and for the salvation of sinners, but it is with great difficulty they procure the means to subsist upon, and almost come to the conclusion to go into secular business in order to gain a livelihood. They are only prevented from so doing by the Macedonian cry, "come over and help us," and still go on suffering, destitute and afflicted, considering the recompence at the resurrection of the just. The cry is for more laborers, but still those now working are not supported; so there is no dependence to be placed on preaching as means to live. Brethren, pray that wisdom and grace may be given to those who labor in the gospel field.

From Eld. J. C. Smith, Kansas.

Our Kansas missionary work still goes forward, and the Lord is blessing wonderfully. All praise be to the Lord on high for his many mighty works. Our meeting at Ripon, was a good one, and an interest stirred up that will last till Jesus comes. Capt. Dany and wife from Indian Territory were there. They invited us into that Territory last winter, when laboring in this same place, and Br. L. Irish and myself went into the Territory, stopping first at Capt. Dany's, as he had circulated the appointment before we arrived, and had made preparation to seat the people that should come. His wife was struck under conviction with a number of others, and wept like a child. From his place we went further into the Nation, and had meetings at Cooly's Bluff, Journey Cake's settlement, and over Sunday at Colored Church, where we had a refreshing time in the Lord. The two first places are situated on the Verdigris river and the latter place on Big Creek. We then came back to Capt. Dany's and preached the funeral discourse of their dead child. We comforted them from the language spoken by Jeremiah concerning Rachel weeping for her children. The hearts of the father and mother were touched by the Spirit of God, and the mother immediately desired to be remembered in the kingdom. The father, though he had lived twenty seven years among the Indians, and passed through all the hardships of an Indian's life, also through the dangers and wickedness of our late war, in which he acted as a Union spy, barely escaping with his life. After passing through all these things, and being a very bad man, his heart has been touched with the fruit of love, and is now melted to grief. He says he has found the right way, is now very anxious for meetings at his place, and will build a church if some one would go there and labor. The tracts I sent him he has scattered in the Nation. He remarked to me that I did not send him half enough.

There is a great desire in the Nation for us to come as soon as possible and baptize a number. Thus the work goes forward there by the little seed sown.

And so it is here in Kansas. The meetings under the direction of our Father, are doing up the work for judgment. We cannot begin to tell you the interest manifested. Wherever we have been the Lord of hosts has been with us, and sectarianism, infidelity and spiritism have been broken down wonderfully. All praise be to the Lord.

Monday, July 28. We came with the tent from Ripon to Chetopa, where we had the tent shipped to Burlington, Coffee Co., and followed. After riding a long distance we reached Br. Dunbar's home, and had a prayer meeting that night Three days more of hard riding through mud and rain, we arrived at our much beloved uncle's home, at Plymouth, and made preparation for a tent meeting.

Aug. 2. We arrived at home with our dear brothers and sisters in Arvonia. With thankful hearts we greeted them, rejoicing that we were once more privileged to meet on the shores of time. The Lord bless the dear orphan children, may they all be ready to meet Jesus when he comes, and greet the darling father and mother that now sleep in death. Their prayers can never be forgotten. When a wicked youth my mother's prayers often ascended to God in my behalf. At her death bed she called her children around her, a large family of twelve with only two absent, and there she bid them a last farewell. She knew she must die. Physicians of skill came from a distance, but no help; the fond, loved mother must die. One by one she called us to her bed side, one by one she asked us to meet her in the kingdom. My turn came. She called me and fondly embraced me for the last time. Said she, "Johnnie, will you try and meet me in the kingdom?" Such entreaty, how could I forget it; those words with the power of the Spirit of God, broke my stubborn heart. I knew that mother loved me. Often would I hear her prayers in my behalf, and others in the family, but more especially for me, as I was a wayward youth, often disobeying her law and grieving her so that tears would flow. And beside her dying couch, I bowed the knee with a brother and sister, and there I begged for pardon and asked for mercy and forgiveness, and there I found acceptance with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. My sins rolled off like a heavy load, and promised that, by the help of God, I would endeavor to meet that dearest of mothers in the kingdom, and by his grace sisting me I expect to be an overcomer, and with Jesus on his throne.

Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory rough our Lord Jesus Christ. I pray the tire family may be saved in the Kingdom. others and sisters, what say you? shall we be there? Selected.

Are the Dead Conscious?

Dear Sir,—The texts quoted by Mr. Maude teach the present possession of eternal life by the saints in some sense; yet others teach that they will die, will fall asleep, but will subsequently be raised (1 Thess. 4: 13, 16), and made alive at Ch coming. (1 Cor. 15: 22.)

I wish to ask, Does not Paul give us a principle of interpretation, and of which we have numerous illustrations, that will enable us to see "meaning is God's word" as to both classes of passages?

In Romans 4: 17, we are told that God quickens the dead, and calls those things that be not as though they were.

The saints are said to have been chosen before they existed (Eph. 1: 4); to have had grace given them before the world began (2 Tim. 1: 9); to have eternal life (1 John 5: 13); to have all things (1 Cor. 3: 21); to have "come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, and to the general assembly and Church of the firstborn; to God, the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect. (Heb. 12: 22.)

It was, I think, by an application of this principle that Jesus silenced "certain of the Sadducees, who denied that there is any resurrection" (Luke 20:27), when he said, "Touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham? ....God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." (Matt. 22: 31, 32)

If the fact that God is the God of the living proves Abraham conscious, how can our Lord's words be said to touch the resurrection?

God calls those things that be not as though they were; so Isaiah, by inspiration seven hundred years before the event writes, "Unto us a Child is born."

From all this I infer that we have Divine warrant to say that we have what we have God's promise of. "This is the promise that he hath promised us, eternal life; and this life is in his Son." "When Christ who is our life shall appear," then shall we have given us the resurrection life, which is meantime ours,—the treasure in the heavens, hid with Christ in God. "Being justified freely by his grace, we are made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." (Heb. 9: 27.)

"It is appointed unto men once to die; the saints must die, but the certainty in their case of waking to an endless life makes it appropriate to call the interval between death and resurrection a sleep. In the case of a few there will be no interval; so Paul says, "We shall not all sleep," not we shall not all die; for all must die; the first death "hath passed upon all men. (Rom. 5; 15.)

"I shall be satisfied when I awake," says David. "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth," or plainly, "Lazarus is dead," saith he who is the Resurrection and the Life. Mark the order of the words; the life follows the resurrection. He rose in the power of an endless life, and so it must surely be with his members, who are his body: "All his who are in the graves shall come to forth to the resurrection of life." How so if they never die? The evil rise to the resurrection of condemnation (John 5: 29,) eternal destruction, the second death.—J. Stev ns, in Rainbow.

FOR Christ when he cometh is nothing else but joy and sweetness to a trembling and broken heart, as here Paul witnesseth, who setteth him out with this most sweet and comfortable title, when he saith, "Who loved me and gave Himself for me."—Luther.

Our Young Folks.

Aunt Polly's Advice.

All things go wrong in the household
(As they often will you know),
Or you're worried out with cares that vex you,
And the children try you so,
Don't sit in a vale of shadows,
Or stoop to be a scold;
'Twill only make bad worse, you see,
While you grow gray and old.

I know how things will bother,
While work seems mountain high,
And the adding of a feather's weight
Makes you feel as if you'd fly;
And then perhaps your husband
Says something quite unkind
(He has his troubles too, poor man),
So pray, then, never mind.

A sharp retort is best unsaid,
Though censure's hard to bear;
But John may think your're most to blame
If you his spirit share.
Then keep your temper, little Nell,
Just do the best you can,
And by and by God will unfold
The secret of his plan.

I've had my troubles too, dear Nell,
And many and many a day,
If the Lord had not been with me,
I'd fainted by the way.
Then let faith hold her brooding wing
O'er all your doubts and fears;
And God will give the needed
For all the coming.

"Katy Didn't."

"Papa," said Katy, sitting on her father's knee, "what is the reason that some days are so lucky and other days so unlucky? To-day began all wrong, and everything that has happened today has been wrong; while on other days I begin right, and all goes right, straight through. If Aunt Linie had not kept me in the morning, I should not have been marked at school, and then I should not have been cross, and then I should not have had so many disagreeable things the rest of the time."

"But what did Aunt Linie keep you for, child?"

"To sew on the string of my hat, papa."

"How did it happen to be off?"

"Well," said Katy slowly, "that I suppose was my fault, for it came off on Tuesday, and I didn't fasten it on."

"So, you see, we must go back of Aunt Linie for this unlucky day of yours. Did you ever hear the old saying, 'For a want of a nail, the shoe was lost?'

"Tell me," cried Katy, who loved stories dearly. So her father replied:

"For the want of a nail, the shoe was lost;
For the want of a shoe, the horse was lost;
For the want of a horse, the rider, was lost;
For the want of the rider, the battle was lost;
For the want of the battle, the kingdom was lost;
And all for the want of a horseshoe nail."

"O papa!" cried the little girl, "I see what you mean. Who would have thought such a speck of a thing as not sewing on my string at the right time would make a difference in a whole day? Whenever I feel like neglecting little things, I will say, "For want of a nail, the shoe was lost," I will."—Miss Coolidge's "What Katy Did."

What Ailed Oliv r?

"Get up, little boy! You are lying in bed too long; breakfast will soon be ready. The canary bird has taken his bath, and is now singing a sweet song. Get up, get up, or I shall throw this pillow at you!"

That is what sister Charlotte said to Oliver Reed, one frosty morning in November. He was a good little fellow; but he had one fault—he was too fond of lying in bed in the morning.

"Don't throw the pillow at me!" cried Oliver; "I'll promise to get up in five minutes."

"If you would be 'healthy, wealthy, and wise,' you must rise early, little boy," said Charlotte.

When Oliver came down to the breakfast table, his father said, "How is this, Oliver? You are late again."

Oliver hung his head; and Charlotte said, "I woke him in good season, sir; but he went off to sleep again the minute I left the room, though he promised to be up in five minutes."

"I went to sleep and forgot all about it," said Oliver.

"Come here, my boy, and let me feel of your pulse," said his father. "I should not wonder if Oliver were suffering from a disease which is very common at this time."

Oliver gave his hand to his father, who after feeling his pulse, said; "Yes, it is as I thought. Poor Oliver has Slack's disease. Take him up to bed again. Put his breakfast by the side of the bed; and when he feels strong enough he can eat it. He may stay at home from school to-day."

The little boy wondered what Slack's disease could be; but he went up stairs with his sister, and was put to bed. He could not sleep, however. He heard children playing out of doors; he heard Ponto barking, and Tommy, the canary bird, sing a sweet song.

Then Oliver called his sister, and said "Charlotte, what is Slack's disease? Is it very dangerous?"

"I'd rather think not," said Charlotte. "You dear little simpleton, don't you know what father meant? He meant that you were troubled with laziness; that's all."

Oliver saw that a trick had been played on him. He jumped out of bed dressed and ate his breakfast, and ran off to school, where he arrived just in season.

Since that day, Olive has been the first up in the house. He is no longer troubled with Slack's disease.—Nursery.

The Care of God.

"Do see this lock of hair?" said an old man to me.

"Yes, but what of it? It is, I suppose, the curl from the head of a dear child long since dead."

"It is not, it is a lock of my own hair; and it is now nearly seventy years since it was cut from this head."

"Why do you prize a lock of your hair so much?"

"It has a story belonging to it, and a strange one. I keep it thus with care because it speaks to me more of God and of his special care then any thing else I possess.

"I was a little child of four years old with long curly locks, which, in sun, or rain, or wind, hung down my cheeks uncovered. One day my father went into the wood to cut up a log, and I went with him. I was standing a little way behind him, or rather at his side, watching with interest the strokes of the heavy ax, as it went up and down upon the wood, sending off splinters with every stroke, in all directions. Some of the splinters fell at my feet, and I eagerly stooped to pick them up. In doing so I stumbled forward, and in a moment my curly head lay upon the log. I had fallen just at the moment the ax was coming down with all its force. It was too late to stop the blow. Down came the ax. I screamed, and my father fell to the ground in terror. He could not stay the stroke, and in the blindness which the sudden horror caused he thought he had killed his boy. We soon recovered—I from my fright and he from his terror. He caught me in his arms, and looked at me from head to foot, to find out the deadly wound he was sure he inflicted. Not a drop of blood nor a scar was to be seen. He knelt upon the grass and gave thanks to the gracious God. Having done so, he took up his ax, and found a few hairs upon its edge. He turned to the log he had been splitting, and there was a single curl of his boy's hair, sharply cut through and laid upon the wood. How great the escape! It was as if an angel had turned aside the edge at the moment it was descending on my head.

"That lock he kept all his days as a memorial of God's care and love. That lock he left to me on his deathbed: I kept it with care. It tells me of my father's God and mine. It rebukes unbelief and alarm. It bids me trust him forever. I have had many tokens of fatherly love in my threescore years and ten, but somehow this speaks most to my heart. It is the oldest and perhaps the most striking. It used to speak to my father's heart; it now speaks to mine."

Was not this an instance of delivering mercy on the part of our God? And this God is the same kind Being who gave you life, and has watched over and cared for you until now.—The Life-Boat.

If the fact that God is the God of the living proves Abraham conscious, how can our Lord's words be said to touch the resurrection?

God calls those things that be not as though they were; so Isaiah, by inspiration seven hundred years before the event writes, "Unto us a Child is born."

From all this I infer that we have Divine warrant to say that we have what we have God's promise of. "This is the promise that he hath promised us, eternal life; and this life is in his Son." "When Christ who is our life shall appear," then shall we have given us the resurrection life, which is meantime ours,—the treasure in the heavens, hid with Christ in God. "Being justified freely by his grace, we are made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." (Heb. 9: 27.)

"It is appointed unto men once to die; the saints must die, but the certainty in their case of waking to an endless life makes it appropriate to call the interval between death and resurrection a sleep. In the case of a few there will be no interval; so Paul says, "We shall not all sleep," not we shall not all die; for all must die; the first death "hath passed upon all men. (Rom. 5; 15.)

"I shall be satisfied when I awake," says David. "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth," or plainly, "Lazarus is dead,' saith he who is the Resurrection and the Life. Mark the order of the words; the life follows the resurrection. He rose in the power of an endless life, and so it must surely be with his members, who are his body: "All his who are in the graves shall come to forth to the resurrection of life." How so if they never die? The evil rise to the resurrection of condemnation (John 5: 29,) eternal destruction, the second death.—J. Stevens, in Rainbow.

FOR Christ when he cometh is nothing else but joy and sweetness to a trembling and broken heart, as here Paul witnesseth, who setteth him out with this most sweet and comfortable title, when he saith, "Who loved me and gave Himself for me."—Luther.

ALL the sobriety which religion needs or requires, is that which real earnestness produces. Tears and shadows are not needful to sobriety.

Our Young Folks.

Aunt Polly's Advice.

All things go wrong in the household
(As they often will you know),
Or you're worried out with cares that vex you,
And the children try you so,
Don't sit in a vale of shadows,
Or stoop to be a scold;
'Twill only make bad worse, you see,
While you grow gray and old.

I know how things will bother,
While work seems mountain high,
And the adding of a feather's weight
Makes you feel as if you'd fly;
And then perhaps your husband
Says something quite unkind
(He has his troubles too, poor man),
So pray, then, never mind.

A sharp retort is best unsaid,
Though censure's hard to bear;
But John may think your're most to blame
If you his spirit share.
Then keep your temper, little Nell,
Just do the best you can,
And by and by God will unfold
The secret of his plan.

I've had my troubles too, dear Nell,
And many and many a day,
If the Lord had not been with me,
I'd fainted by the way.
Then let faith hold her brooding wing
O'er all your doubts and fears;
And God will give the needed
For all the coming.

"Katy Didn't."

"Papa," said Katy, sitting on her father's knee, "what is the reason that some days are so lucky and other days so unlucky? To-day began all wrong, and everything that has happened today has been wrong; while on other days I begin right, and all goes right, straight through. If Aunt Linie had not kept me in the morning, I should not have been marked at school, and then I should not have been cross, and then I should not have had so many disagreeable things the rest of the time."

"But what did Aunt Linie keep you for, child?"

"To sew on the string of my hat, papa."

"How did it happen to be off?"

"Well," said Katy slowly, "that I suppose was my fault, for it came off on Tuesday, and I didn't fasten it on."

"So, you see, we must go back of Aunt Linie for this unlucky day of yours. Did you ever hear the old saying, 'For a want of a nail, the shoe was lost?'

"Tell me," cried Katy, who loved stories dearly. So her father replied:

"For the want of a nail, the shoe was lost;
For the want of a shoe, the horse was lost;
For the want of a horse, the rider, was lost;
For the want of the rider, the battle was lost;
For the want of the battle, the kingdom was lost;
And all for the want of a horseshoe nail."

"O papa!" cried the little girl, "I see what you mean. Who would have thought such a speck of a thing as not sewing on my string at the right time would make a difference in a whole day? Whenever I feel like neglecting little things, I will say, "For want of a nail, the shoe was lost," I will,"—Miss Coolidge's "What Katy Did."

What Ailed Oliver?

"Get up, little boy! You are lying in bed too long; breakfast will soon be ready. The canary bird has taken his bath, and is now singing a sweet song. Get up, get up, or I shall throw this pillow at you!"

That is what sister Charlotte said to Oliver Reed, one frosty morning in November. He was a good little fellow; but he had one fault—he was too fond of lying in bed in the morning.

"Don't throw the pillow at me!" cried Oliver; "I'll promise to get up in five minutes."

"If you would be 'healthy, wealthy, and wise,' you must rise early, little boy," said Charlotte.

When Oliver came down to the breakfast table, his father said, "How is this, Oliver? You are late again."

Oliver hung his head; and Charlotte said, "I woke him in good season, sir; but he went off to sleep again the minute I left the room, though he promised to be up in five minutes."

"I went to sleep and forgot all about it," said Oliver.

"Come here, my boy, and let me feel of your pulse," said his father. I should not wonder if Oliver were suffering from a disease which is very common at this time."

Oliver gave his hand to his father, who after feeling his pulse, said; "Yes, it is as I thought. Poor Oliver has Slack's disease. Take him up to bed again. Put his breakfast by the side of the bed; and when he feels strong enough he can eat it. He may stay at home from school to-day."

The little boy wondered what Slack's disease could be; but he went up stairs with his sister, and was put to bed. He could not sleep, however. He heard children playing out of doors; he heard Ponto barking, and Tommy, the canary bird, sing a sweet song.

Then Oliver called his sister, and said "Charlotte, what is Slack's disease? Is it very dangerous?"

"I'd rather think not," said Charlotte. "You dear little simpleton, don't you know what father meant? He meant that you were troubled with laziness; that's all."

Oliver saw that a trick had been played on him. He jumped out of bed dressed and ate his breakfast, and ran off to school, where he arrived just in season.

Since that day, Olive has been the first up in the house. He is no longer troubled with Slack's disease.—Nursery.

The Care of God.

"Do see this lock of hair?" said an old man to me.

"Yes, but what of it? It is, I suppose, the curl from the head of a dear child long since dead."

"It is not, it is a lock of my own hair; and it is now nearly seventy years since it was cut from this head."

"Why do you prize a lock of your hair so much?"

"It has a story belonging to it, and a strange one. I keep it thus with care because it speaks to me more of God and of his special care then any thing else I possess.

"I was a little child of four years old with long curly locks, which, in sun, or rain, or wind, hung down my cheeks uncovered. One day my father went into the wood to cut up a log, and I went with him. I was standing a little way behind him, or rather at his side, watching with interest the strokes of the heavy ax, as it went up and down upon the wood, sending off splinters with every stroke, in all directions. Some of the splinters fell at my feet, and I eagerly stooped to pick them up. In doing so I stumbled forward, and in a moment my curly head lay upon the log. I had fallen just at the moment the ax was coming down with all its force. It was too late to stop the blow. Down came the ax. I screamed, and my father fell to the ground in terror. He could not stay the stroke, and in the blindness which the sudden horror caused he thought he had killed his boy. We soon recovered—I from my fright and he from his terror. He caught me in his arms, and looked at me from head to foot, to find out the deadly wound he was sure he inflicted. Not a drop of blood nor a scar was to be seen. He knelt upon the grass and gave thanks to the gracious God. Having done so, he took up his ax, and found a few hairs upon its edge. He turned to the log he had been splitting, and there was a single curl of his boy's hair, sharply cut through and laid upon the wood. How great the escape! It was as if an angel had turned aside the edge at the moment it was descending on my head.

"That lock he kept all his days as a memorial of God's care and love. That lock he left to me on his deathbed: I kept it with care. It tells me of my father's God and mine. It rebukes unbelief and alarm. It bids me trust him forever. I have had many tokens of fatherly love in my threescore years and ten, but somehow this speaks most to my heart. It is the oldest and perhaps the most striking. It used to speak to my father's heart; it now speaks to mine."

Was not this an instance of delivering mercy on the part of our God? And this God is the same kind Being who gave you life, and has watched over and cared for you until now.—The Life-Boat.

Book Notices, Etc.

"The Rochester Time Discussion," by Charles C. Barker and James H. Whitmore. The report of this discussion will be ready for delivery about the 22d of September (inst.) in a volume of more than two hundred pages. The known ability of the disputants and the momentous importance of the subject considered by them, conspire to make this book one of the most interesting contributions our literature has yet received.

Whether "the definite time of the second advent is revealed in the Holy Scriptures" is a question of no slight moment. It has been truly said that "the status of modern Adventism is deeply involved in this subject." Let every one carefully and candidly weigh the arguments pro and con as adduced in this debate, and be "fully persuaded in their own minds," "what is truth."

The price of the work will be 50c., postage 5c. Orders may be addressed to William E. Brown, South Butler, N. Y., or William L. Himes, Castleton, Vt.

The book will also be for sale at the office of the A. C. TIMES.

Poetry.

Truth Lives On.

Through the rugged march of time,
Marked with mis'ry, sin and crime,
Error stalks with upreared head,
O'er her fields of slaughtered dead;
But beneath her bloody tread
The Truth lives on.

Warriors strong and brave of yore,
Drenched Judea's plains with gore,
And the land with war was rife,
For his tomb who hated strife,
In the teachings of whose life
The Truth lives on.

Progress rolls her car along,
Slowly righting human wrong;
Might the right may crucify,
Nothing can her power defy;
Though Herod live and Jesus die,
The Truth lives on.

Burning faggots blazing high,
Gibbets tow'ring to the sky,
Inquisition's rack and pain,
Slavery clanking loud its chain,
Falsehood triumphs still in vain;
The Truth lives on.

Underneath this load of wrong,
Truth eternal moves along;
Every true heart's mighty throe
Rolls away some human woe;
Error reels beneath the blow,
And truth lives on.

Fountains of the deep are stirred,
Mighty thoughts unbreathed in word,
Till the living Future's soul,
Bursting forth, will spurn control;
Shouts of freedom heavenward roll,
And Truth lives on.

Every blow at slavery's yoke,
Every true word boldly spoke,
Every holy thought within,
Breaks and curbs the power of sin;
Freedom's dawn is ushered in,
And Truth lives on.

The Hope and Its Consummation.

It may be asked, Has not the Church many hopes, not one only? We answer she has many refuges, many consolations, in a time of evil; yet she has but one hope. No doubt, that one great hope may be said to include many lesser ones, being like the sun in the center of a whole system of planets; still the Church's hope is more properly one; the hope of her Lord's coming, or the hope of the kingdom, which is to be her's at his coming. Until that hope is realized, she has many props on which to lean, many cordials to sustain and cheer her. She has present fellowship with Him for whose coming she is waiting. She has her closet, with its shut door, into which she can at all times betake herself when the tumult grows louder and the storm beats with more than common fierceness. She has the consciousness of her own security, what ever may befall the earth, and of her relationship to him who "sits upon the floods," and stills the tumults of the people. She has the Book of God for guidance, and companionship, and light, so that the in darkest hour of the world's midnight she has a light; in the loneliest path along which she has to pass she has society; and in the most intricate thicket or untrodden waste she has an unfailing guide.

All these things she has; and they are all needful and most welcome. But she has something more than these; something beyond these; something to which all these are leading her, and in which they shall ere long be consummated; something of which these are the daily pledges and foretastes. That something is the appearing and kingdom of her Lord. This is her true hope, her polestar, her joy and rejoicing. In this she finds the consummation of all that she has been anticipating and preparing for while here. That Christ will come again—that he will come in his glory—that he will come to set up his kingdom—that he will come to be glorified by his saints, and admired in all them that believe—is what the reader of the Bible knows. Many of the minor points connected with these things we may not fully apprehend nor agree upon, but on these great points we are all at one. We believe that the Lord Jesus, who come the first time in weekness and shame, will come the second time in divine power and glory.

But more than this. It seems very evident that these glorious things are not merely spoken of as futurities, but revealed as the matter of our hope. These things make up our hope; they are not so much separate hopes, as parts of one great hope—stars of one firmament—rays of one sun. In them we find the whole summing up of the things we hoped for. The coming and the kingdom of the Lord Jesus—this is what seems to us to be the great theme and object of our hope.

But let us inquire more particularly into this hope, or at least into the reasons why we give the Lord's coming and kingdom so proemintly this name.

1. God has bidden us look for them. To "wait for his Son from heaven" is what he commanded us. To look out with trimmed lamps and girded loins for the Bridegroom's arrival is what he expects of her who calls herself the Bride of the Lamb. And the Lord himself has, once and again, made the words of warning ring in our ears, "Watch, for ye know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of man cometh." He has put also into our lips the prayer, "Thy kingdom come." On such hopes as these he has bidden us rest our souls, in the day of our strangership on earth. With such hopes he has exhorted us to comfort ourselves when trouble besets us and evil days arise. When the shadows hang heavily above us, and on all sides there is sorrow, and confussion, and perplexity, then he asks us to lift up our heads, knowing that our redemption is nigh.

2. The early Church did so. Evil soon came down upon the Church like a dark storm cloud. The primitive saints were made to feel the perils and tribulations of which the Master had warned them from the first. The sword awoke against them. The wrath of man burst forth. The world soon made it manifest how much it hated them. In these evil days they grasped the hope; and they found how well it suited. It did not calm the storm; it did not sheathe the sword; it did not arrest the hatred or still the warth that was arising against them. But it lifted them above these sorrows, and made them speak of them as "light afflictions," lasting but "a moment," which were not worthy to be compared with the glory to be revealed, and which were working for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Thus they were sustained and cheered. Thus they had light in their dwellings in the days of darkness. They felt that each blast that broke upon them, sharp and heavy as it might be, was waiting them more swiftly to their haven.

3. There is nothing in the future between us and that object worth looking for. Sorrow, darkness, confusion, death on every hand! All before us a desolate wilderness—a vale of tears—a land of graves. "Much tribulation," or as it is literally, "many tribulations," do we find everywhere in the Church's path. Man, with all his wisdom, can not help us to remove one of these evils. There they are, and they must remain until the the Lord return. And even though there may be glimpses of sunshine bursting through, yet these are transient and without power, and unsatisfactory. There is nothing calm, nothing bright, nothing blessed, nothing that will abide, on this side the day of the Lord.

4. That object—or these objects, taking them as two—the coming and the Kingdon, are really worthy of being our hope. They are so very glorious, so worthy of God, so worthy of Him who died to purchase for us the inheritance. "Wherefore, God is not ashamed to be called our God, for He hath prepared for us a city." It will compensate for all sorrow here; nay, it will make us wonder why we ever wept with such a glory before us as our hope. Come then, war or peace, we will lift up our heads! Come mirth or sadness, come ease or pain, come light or darkness, come bonds or liberty, come trial or rest—we will be of good cheer, for the Captain of our salvation fights for us—the King of Kings is at hand. The skies will soon rend, the day will soon break, the shadows will soon flee away.—Sel.

Patient Continuance.

There is an old story that, at the battle of New Orleans, half a century ago, a volunteer fighter from the back-woods, not connected with any company or regiment, came on the field and went into the contest with great courage and enthusiasm, and that he attracted attention by his intense desire to know the effect of his balls. At every shot he mounted the breastwork and peered anxiously into the smoke to see if anybody was hit.

His conduct seemed to us slightly unreasonable. The smoke was thick, and he could not see all that took place among the enemy. Moreover, many rifles were aimed in the same direction, and it was impossible to ascertain the precise effect of each of them. The extempore soldier ought not to have lessened his share of the victory by wasting time in trying to identify it.

Yet we are prone to copy the example of the inconsiderate and anxious warrior. In urging reforms, in preaching, in teaching, it is possible for a vein of self to get into our zeal, and we become anxious not only to do good, but to have the credit of it. If a soul is saved clearly and directly by our instrumentality, it is certainly a legitimate matter of rejoicing. If the word of warning or of cheer prove to be just the right word at the right time, and helped a soul through Despond or out of the grasp of Despair, we have a right to be glad; and, indeed, if we are not glad, we must be curiously constructed Christians. The Lord of the harvest gives these encouragements, now and then, to his reapers, lest they grow weary.

Nevertheless, even this gladness needs to be watched, lest there get into it something of vain glory, which, if not absolutely sinful in itself, detracts from its value in the sight of God, and proves a dead fly in the precious ointment. We ought to look for present results, and yet not be feverishly anxious. We must not be so intent on this divine recognition of our labors, and half angry, if the desired evidence is not given. For ordinary times, and the general work, we need a self-forgetful zeal which cheerfully and patiently toils off, never chilled by delay, undismayed even by present failure. Many a seed perishes in the earth. Of the cloud of bloom which covers the orchard in May, only here and there a blossom produces an apple. The returns of the officers who have charge of the ammunition show that in a great battle, in which thousands of men are killed and wounded, only one or two balls out of a hundred hit. Yet the orchard in October bends under its golden burden; the fields in their season are white to the harvest, and the great empires are conquered in war. He who would accomplish anything worth the doing, has need to be persistent in his work. It is "by patient continuance in well-doing" that we attain "glory, honor and immortality."

The teacher needs a large share of this patience. The seed sown sometimes dies in the ground. The Saviour himself not seldome spake his blessed words to dull ears and hard hearts. He visited many places where he could not do many mighty works because of the unbelief of the people. "It is enough for the deciple that he is as his Master."

Why then should we be dismayed if at times the success seems small? The victory is sure. Truth will triumph over error and right over wrong. Any coward will chase a flying foe. It is only when the battle "waxes hot" that the highest courage is displayed.

None but the truly brave stand firm in the midst of apparent defeat.—Dr. Crane in S. S. Times.

Models Of Prayer.

We have been interested in looking through the Scriptures for the purpose of comparing the prayers therein recorded with those which we hear from time to time in public, and we are astonished to see how they differ in point, expression, directness, and above all, in length, from these days in the Christian pulpit.

It is no exaggeration to say that we have listened to a single prayer longer than the whole ten that we find in the Bible, put together. The first is in Gen. 24: 12–14, and contains one hundred and ten words, and it is not more than one minute in length. The next is in Exodus 33: 12–15, and contains one hundred and eleven words, and is not over a minute long. The third is in Joshua 7: 7–9, and contains ninety words. The fourth is in 2 Kings 19: 15–19, the prayer of Hezekiah; it is composed of one hundred and thirty-four words, and two minutes would be ample time to repeat it. Another is found in Nehemiah 1: 5–11, and is about two minutes in length; another is in Ezra 9: 6–15, and is about three minutes long; another is in 1 Kings 8: 23–61, an important dedicatory prayer, offered by Solomon himself, at the dedication of the temple, and it did not occupy more than six minutes; while that of Dan. 9: 11–19, was less than four minutes long.

In the New Testament, the prayer of our Saviour, John 17, is well known; it is contained in twenty-six verses, and is five minutes long; while the model prayer—the Lord's prayer—is far briefer still. Now here are ten prayers, from those who certainly knew how to pray, and they are all less than thirty-five minutes long, or an average of three minutes each; yet we hear men pray thirty and forty minutes; and after wandering all over the moral universe, and wearying their fellow-worshpers with vain repetitions, utterly fail of the prime object of all public prayer, to lift up the hearts of men to commune with heaven.

It must be an extraordinary occasion, equal at least to the dedication of the Jewish temple in Jerusalem—an occasion that none of us shall ever see—to justify a prayer more than five minutes long. There are few "oh's" and "ah's" in these models; their authors do not often say, "O Lord, Lord," but tenderly, filially, directly, quietly, simply, they ask the blessing they desire, as though they were children who knew that they were addressing One who was more willing to give them good gifts than they were to ask them at his hand.—Gospel Banner.

English Ritualism.

The efforts to check the ritualistic and Roamish tendencies in the English church do not appear to be very successful. The drift is so evidently in the wrong direction that the high dignitaries of the establishment who would arrest it, seems to be almost powerless. A London clergyman, in the last Evangelist, says:

> As you will see from the papers, Ritualism is lifting its head higher and higher in England. I cannot conceive of the Evangelical party in the Church of England and the Ritualists holding together much longer. I was told by a brother minister, only two days ago, that a gentleman whom he met in the town five days ago, and who has a son, a Ritualistic clergyman, told him that to his certain knowledge, a clergyman in London "confessed last year thirteen hundred persons," large numbers of whom were "men—lawyers, bankers, and merchants." The rate at which this system of anti-Protestantism and anti-Reformation is advancing, is perfectly amazing. However, the Evangelical part of the community is fully alive to the danger which surrounds it, and never was so prepared to meet it. God is on our side, and truth will prevail.

The fact that nearly five hundred of the clergy recently petitioned Parliament to establish by law auricular confession in the church, is a significant one, and shows how far the "whole lump" is becoming leavened with the spirit of Popery. The Establisment is evidently going back to the source of its origin; and the indications certainly are that a disrupture between the opposing elements of which it is composed, must ere long take place. And the sooner the better for Evangelical Christianity. There is still undoubtedly a large majority of the membership opposed to ritualism and Romanism, but the toleration which these things receive within the church tends constantly to strengthen them, and to weaken the Evangelical party. Nothing would be so effectual as a bold and open stand—a protest which would compel the papal emissaries to abandon the church and appear in their true relations and under their true colors.—The Standard.

Faith takes hold on something that is substantial and true, and makes the heart triumph in hope.

The Identity of Man in Death.

E. ROYCE.

That "man dieth and wasteth away" is an obvious fact, admitted by all; and that he will again, at some future time, re-live by a resurrection from the dead is an important tenet in the creeds if not in the faith of christendom. But how individual identity is preserved between death and the resurrection, is a question on which there is a vast difference of opinion. That the individuality of each person must and will be preserved in some way is certain; else the resurrection, without this connecting link to a former life, would be as much a new creation as was the formation of the first man—Adam. This fact has led to much thought and study by those who hope to be the happy recipients of the blessings connected with its fruition, and though it would seem to the candid mind that on a point like this, confessedly somewhat obscure and not necessarily effecting the elementary principles of christian faith, there might be a wide difference of opinion among the professed followers of the same Master, without engendering bitter feelings in the minds of either party; yet, as has ever been the case on theological questions especially when one side greatly preponderates in numerical adherents over the other, the very reverse is true. For it is a fact which the history of Christianity for sixteen centuries amply sustains, that not only have religious errors had more ready adherents and advocates than plain, scriptural truth, but, as a general rule, the greater the error the more tenacious, vindictive and bitter are its supporters towards the minority who differ from them. This being true we ought not, in this age, to be deluded into the belief that any particular theory on the way the identity of man in death is preserved, must, or is more certain, even, of being correct because it is believed, sustained and upheld by the great majority of Christian professors, especially when most of them show a bitter, unchristian spirit towards those who conscientiously differ from them. Neither ought we on the other hand, in our zeal to avoid one great error, go to the opposite extreme and adopt another, which, if not as glaring and is seemingly more in harmony with Scripture, yet may be in reality as far from the truth.

I am aware I am not adding to the stock of knowledge of my readers when I record the fact that there are, at the present time, two theories on this question diametrically opposed to each other. I refer to the doctrine of the innate immortality of man in this life, in contradistinction to his entire mortality. The one is sustained not only by that large class of professors included in the general term, orthodox, but by Catholics and Universalists besides; and, it might be truly added, by all heathendom also. The other is advocated by a small minority only, and they are very unpopular, as may well be supposed, with the great majority. The first or prevailing belief on this question is, that man's identity in death is preserved by the continued conscious existence of what they term his immortal soul, unaffected by the dissolution of the body. The minority hold that man is strictly mortal; consequently in death unconscious. And that his identity in death is preserved —not by a distinct soul or spirit, but by the power of God to hold in remembrance each individual, and at the resurrection to collect and re-embody the same matter of which each body was composed at death; thus literally resurrecting the same material person who died.

These are the two theories at issue on this question, and it is not the object of this article to sustain either, for the very good reason that the writer believes there is more or less error on both sides, and that the truth, as is often the case on other matters, lies somewhere between the two extremes. The doctrine of the immortality of the soul is based on the assumption that matter, organized or otherwise, cannot think. And knowing man possesses this ability the advocates of this doctrine claim he must be, and consequently is, endowed with a conscious entity—an immortal soul, which is, strictly speaking, the real man which does the thinking, reasoning, etc., and that the body is only its house. Consequently, when the body dies, the soul leaves its clay tenement with its powers unaffected by the change, and occupies a place for weal or woe, according to character. And in this way they believe personal identity in death is preserved. As it forms no part of the object of this article to discuss this question at length, I shall only remark concerning it: (1.) That with what ever force its advocates may project their dogma against their opponents, its rebound will give them an equally severe blow; it being like a risky musket—unsafe at both ends. For if it requires an immortal soul in order to be able to think, then beasts must possess one also, for it is a well-known fact that they do possess that ability; and, not only that, but they can and do reason. Hence, the high-sounding charge against the doctrine of their opponents, that it makes man no better than a brute is equally true in their own case; thus verifying the truth of the old adage that, "people living in glass houses should not throw stones." (2.) If the soul can think, reason, suffer and enjoy after the body is dead, surely it can do so while it is alive; so, brains or no brains, man could not become insensible. And as we know he can and often does become so while alive, it is unreasonable to believe he cannot nor will not be so in death, especially when we have the direct testimony of Scripture that "the dead know not anything." Let us now turn our attention to, and carefully weigh in the scale of truth and equity, the opposite belief on this question:

That man is mortal, and, consequently in death unconscious, are facts which nature, reason and Scripture unitedly affirm. But that his individual identity will, or can, be made good by his Maker at the resurrection, by the mere embodiment of a like form, may well be doubted. For it behooves us to remember that the same Being who made man and caused his word to be recorded for his instruction, made Nature's laws also. Therefore, to interpret Scripture contrary to their known operation to prove any doctrine is unwise, as it brings his word and works into conflict. We learn by the operation of his unwritten, his natural laws, that all organic bodies, whether animal or vegetable, ultimately perish; that is, the constituent atoms of which they are formed, are by decomposition resolved back to their native elements." True, another body might be formed of like materials, in like quantities, which would indeed be a perfect fac-simile, but it would not be the same, even if the same specific materials were used. In fact, it would make no difference in individual identity on that account. For we learn by chemical analysis that the properties of each kind of matter are alike; consequently, in the reformation of man at the resurrection, it makes no difference in identity whether the materials had previously been constituent parts of a human or animal body. It could make no possible difference, for the body is continually changing and is not the same, so far as matter is concerned, to-day that it was yesterday. "Man only lives as he dies." And his body is not inaptly compared to "the flame, of a lamp, which appears for a long time the same since it is ceaselessly fed as it ceaselessly melts away." So it is obvious if identity, even in life, is dependent on retaining the same matter it would soon be lost.

But aside from this reasoning we have in Scripture the emphatic testimony of the Apostle Paul, that the same body which turns to dust will not be raised. In explaining this matter to the Corinthian brethren, he takes as an illustration a well-known fact in the reproduction of grain, namely: "that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body shall be;" and his application of it is, "so also is the resurrection of the dead." These declarations of the apostle, and the context, not only quash the minority argument on this question, but gives a key to the truth also. And it is this: all vegetables come forth; a body is matured, they grow old, die, and turn to their native dust. So man also "cometh forth like a flower and is cut down; then shall the earth return to the earth as it was." How is the specific identity of each vegetable preserved in death? The answer to this question is well-known. It is preserved by the seed, or spirit, which contains its life. And it may remain for ages before it is quickened so as to produce a body. Indeed, it may never do so, and surely never will till it feels the power of laws ordained for that purpose. So evidently it is with man. When he dies his dust returns to earth, and his spirit "to God who gave it." There is no distinction in this respect as to character either, all bodies return to earth, all spirits to God; and there will they remain, like re-sown grain, until God quickens them. And this he may or may not do, as suits his pleasure. And as a good husbandman would not again sow seed which had brought forth nought but tares, so God may not quicken the spirits of those who have utterly corrupted and defiled themselves. I know of no place in the Scriptures where spirit and life are synonymous. We read that it takes soul, (or life) body, and spirit, to constitute a living man. The spirit contains the life, hence when it departs the life goes with it, when it returns the life returns with it. Jesus commended his spirit to the Father—Stephen asked his Master to receive his. If either of them had meant their life, merely, would they not have said soul, which means life, instead of saying spirit? I think they would. Job says: "There is a spirit in man and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." Mark! He does not say "giveth it" understanding, as though the spirit could be a conscious entity without the body. No. But he says "giveth them," i. e., soul, body and spirit. It certainly is a mystery how individual identity can be preserved by the spirit. But is it a greater one than the well-known fact that the identity of the oak is preserved in the acorn? Or that seed or material spirit of all males contains not only the life, but all the peculiarities of its species also. It may be more mysterious than either; but, if it is, it does not militate against its being true. Man is something more than a vegetable—something more than an animal. He had the spirit of lives breathed into his nostrils. He was made in the "image" or form of the natural or material, and in the "likeness" of the spiritual or etheral. Hence the working powers of the Deity—the Logos or Word—and the Spirit said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." And it was done. Man has a spirit which the beast has not, which may become the nucleus of a higher life, even as his natural, his material spirit is the embryo principle of his animal life. I say may—not must. For as soon might the husbandman raise a crop of grain without tilling the ground, as could man inherit the kingdom of God without an effort on his own part. The heart must first be subdued and the thorny and thistley propensities must be rooted out, or at least overpowered, before it can bring forth fruit meet for a heavenly home. The word of God is the good seed, and his Spirit the quickening power. But as soon could Nature's laws quicken grain on a bare rock, as the Spirit quicken the word in an obdurate and unbelieving heart. And this was the first great lesson taught to Adam, by his Maker, on the borders of Eden. And this also is the true reason why he cursed the ground, (i. e., left it unblessed in comparison with the garden), for man's "sake." So that he might learn by his daily toil in subduing the earth so it might produce sustenance to supply his temporal wants, what his heart required in order that it might bring forth fruit to supply his spiritual requirements. An excellent lesson, truly, to which his race would do well to take heed. But few, however, do so; the great mass of those who make any effort at all, preferring to climb into the kingdom some easier way.

There is an analogy in many respects between vegetable and animal life; and if an inspired apostle asserts, as has been shown he certainly does, that it holds good in the preservation of the individual identity of man in death, is it not a wise act on our part to believe it?

The Church.—No. 3.

C. C. MARSTON.

The origin of the distinction between these offices is clearly stated by Richard Watson in his Theological Institutes. He says: "It is not indeed to be doubted that, at a very early period, in some instances probably from the time of the apostles themselves, a distinction arose between bishops and elders; and the whole strength of the cause of the Episcopalians lies in this fact. Still this gives not the least sanction to the notion of bishops being a superior order of ministers to presbyters, invested in virtue of that order, and by divine right, with powers of government both over presbyters and people and possessing exclusively the authority of ordaining to the sacred offices of the church. As little too will that ancient distinction be found to prove anything in favor of diocesan episcopacy, which is of still later introduction..... The early distinction made between bishops and the presbyters may be easily accounted for..... In some of the churches mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles the apostles ordained several elders or presbyters, partly to supply the present need and to provide for the future increase of believers, as it is observed by Clemens in his epistle..... That these elders or presbyters had the power of government in the churches cannot be denied, because it is expressly assigned to them in the Scripture. It was inherent in their pastorial office; and the "elders that rule well" were to be "counted worthy of double honor."—(1 Tim. 6:17.) A number of elders therefore being ordained by the apostles to one church, gave rise to the coetus presbyterorum, in which assembly the affairs of the church were attended to, and measures taken for the spread of the gospel, by the aid of the common counsel and efforts of the whole. This meeting of the presbyters would naturally lead to the appointment, whether by seniority or by election, of one to preside over the proceedings of this assembly for the sake of order; and to him was given the title of the angel of the church, and bishop by way of eminence. The latter title came in time to be exclusively used of the elder who presided, because that special oversight imposed upon him by his office, and which, as the churches were raised up in the neighborhood of the larger cities, would also naturally be extended over them.

In harmony with this we find the message of Jesus to the "seven churches of Asia" addressed to the "angel" of each church separately, as may be seen by reference to the third chapter of the Apocalypse.

The duty of an elder in a church seems to be according to the Scriptures: "To rule the church; to have the spiritual oversight or watch or care; and to feed the church.

1. The local elder is to be a ruler in the church over which he is elder.

The following passages are sufficient on this point: "Let the elders who rule well, be counted worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine."—(1 Tim. 5:17.) "Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation... Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for this is unprofitable for you..... Salute all them that have the rule over you, and all the saints. They of Italy salute you."—(Heb. 12: 7, 17, 24.) "One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity."—(1 Tim. 3: 4.) "Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity: he that ruleth, with dilligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness."—(Rom. 12 : 8.) This spiritual rulership is not to be understood in the sense of stern, severe, tyranical dictatorship. In other words the elder in the church of God is not an absolute monarch. But it is to be understood in that milder sense of persuasive and solicitous leadership. He is to "rule well," and he is to be an ensample to the flock. He is not to rule by coercion but by love. He is not to drive but to persuade.

2. The elder is to have the spiritual oversight over the church.

"For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?"—(1 Tim. 3: 5.) "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." —(Acts 20 : 28.)

These passages plainly teach that the elders, presbyters, or bishops, are expected to take the spiritual watchcare and oversight of the church. This would imply that he is a sort of watchman. It is his duty to be informed as to any approaching evil, and to duly notify the flock of the same. Should there be a pestilent element insinuating itself into the church, and thus working the destruction of the body, it is the office of the elder to put at rest all such disturbances. Should a brother fall into error, whether by accident or intention, it is the duty of those having the spiritual watchcare of the flock to see the erring member, and in the spirit of Christ labor for the restoration of the same. No church can be fully and scripturally organized without having these "overseers duly appointed. My authority for this statement is in Acts 20 : 28.

3. The elder is to "feed the church of God."

No church can survive long without being properly fed with suitable food. Some need the "sincere milk of the word," while others may eat with profit "meat," which is much stronger food.—(1 Cor. 3 : 3.) It is reasonable to suppose that there should be some one especially expected to dispense this food to the flock. This part of the work brings us near the ministry. Paul says, "I have fed you," etc. This shows that they who preach are to be feeders of the flock. But all churches can't have a preacher. And there must be some person by the blessing of God, to have a care for the growth and thrift of the flock at all times. This person is the elder. In Paul's address to the elders at Ephesus (Acts 20,) he urges them to "feed the church of God." They feed the flock in many ways. They are to be "ensamples." In this way, as well as by their more public ministrations they are to feed the flock. This is a very solemn and important work. God help those entrusted with it to discharge their obligations faithfully.

A New Creature.

A. J. MARSH.

"Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."–(2 Cor. 5: 17.)

These words convey the idea of a new birth, aside from the one given by earthly parentage, and also shows that we are dispossessed of something that has grown old in us; and these we obtain in this life or world, else plain and simple language is clothed with incongruity. "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." When? Now, or at the resurrection? We answer emphatically, now; because we are called "little children," and admonished to "abide in him; that when he shall appear, we may have confidence," etc.–(1 John 2: 28.) And how can we abide in him, except we be in him? Surely we are in him, therefore are now new creatures and consequently have experienced a new birth.–(c. 3: 1.)

But some one may say how is it possible we are born again, and become new creatures? they having about the same mind Nichodemus had, concerning this grand doctrine, in wonderment exclaiming, "how can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born?" failing entirely of apprehending the truth conveyed, it being "of heavenly things," spiritual, and not discernable by the natural man; because "the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned," and he may only experimently know them, by receiving God's spirit; for "we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God."–(1 Cor. 2: 14 and 12.)

Those who are in Christ are new creatures in a literal sense, as pertains to the 'inner man,'–(Eph. 3: 17,) or the 'new man,'–(Col. 4: 10,) or the mind, by our transformation (new birth) in its renewal,–(Rom. 12:2,) by his spirit's might and power, with its fruits, "love, joy, peace," etc.,–(Gal. 5: 22, 23,) in contradistinction to the flesh with its work, "adultery, strife, envy, murder," etc.,–(vv. 19–21). And "old things have passed away," by their crucifying the flesh with the affections (or passions) and lusts.–(v. 24.)

After doing these things by faith and obedience, in course of time, more or less of an absolute literal change in the physical man takes place, in the phrenology of his head, the seat of power that directs the lusts and affections of the flesh. The reasoning faculties are won by the logic of truth, lightened up by the spirit; then benevolence is awakened, veneration enlisted, firmness or will power captivated and surrendered to God, operating thereafter under the control and leadings of the spirit, with all the rest of the phrenological or physical man, restrained or constrained, decreased or increased, by greater or less use in the right direction as the law of the Lord and the spirit of life in Christ Jesus demands–(Rom. 6: 12–14; 8: 2)

In this condition one will not commit sin. I will put it stronger than that by using the apostle's language, "cannot sin, because he is born of God," present tense.–(1 John 3: 9) Can no more sin, than the German tongue by nature can speak French, or thorns bear figs, or a sweet fountain send forth bitter water, or than a heart with the love of God shed abroad in it by the Holy Ghost given will out of its abundance, speak lies, and blasphemies, or think and feel murder, hatred, adultery, etc.; for such things are incompatible. Neither will there be any inward temptation, or natural inclination to sin, because the flesh will not lust to envy, pride, or adultery, etc., it being crucified with the affections and lusts.–(Gal. 5: 24.)

Though let it be understood, this is not an unalterable condition, neither one in which we may cease watching and working, for that would be to commit sin at once—that of omission; but quite to the contrary, it is a condition so easily fallen from, that there is where the danger lies, and the watch care needed; we need to be ever vigilant that the enemy beguile us not out of this position: for in it is the only place where we are out of his power, and safe from his clutches. The old man is liable to resurrect, and the carnal mind come in at any moment, by our taking our will and case out of God's hands, and failing to live and walk in the spirit.–(Gal. 5: 25; Rom. 8: 1–10.) Hence we are admonished to "quench not the spirit,"–(1 Thes. 5:19,) "Grieve not the spirit,"–(Eph. 4: 30,) "be fervent in spirit,"–(Rom. 12: 11,) and to "work out our salvation with fear and trembling."

Many have great trouble in trying to live a religious life, because instead of living and walking in the spirit as they should,–(Gal. 5: 16, 25,) they continue or get back to walking and living in the flesh,–(Rom. 8: 8,) ever warring after it,–(2 Cor. 10: 3; Jas. 4: 1,) suing and being sued, slandering and being slandered, being continually overcome of evil, instead of overcoming evil with good.—In fact they are only partially converted.

Away with all opposition, and let us have pure hearts, wholy sanctified and perfect; perfect in patience, love, wisdom, restraint of the tongue, etc., with clean hands to meet our Lord in, "for without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

Neither is this a "second blessing," as some may suppose, but should and does take place when one is truly converted to God, by beginning there and going on until one attains all the properties of perfection, some of which are these—wisdom which is gotten by study and having our senses used,–(1 Cor. 2: 6; Cor. 1: 28, and mar. of Heb. 5: 14; 1 Cor. 14: 20,) another, patience which comes by tribulation, –(Rom. 5: 3; Jas. 1: 4;) these, and perfection in love, controling the tongue, purity, holiness, sanctification, etc., should and do begin at the true conversion and end in glory, having no "second blessing" about them.

That idea is probably grounded upon the experience obtained by an acquisition of more knowledge, faith and love, given by the Word and Holy Ghost, under developing circumstances; for instance like Rom. 5: 3–5; 2 Pet. 1: 5–7. Consecration or sanctification, is inseperable with conversion, and must be gone on from unto perfection, which the apostle says, "we will do if God permit"–(Heb. 6: 1–3.)

Lay Hold on Eternal Life.

In time of storm, men are often thrown overboard and are in danger of being lost. The rope is often thrown, or the life-boat let down to save them, and they are exhorted to lay hold. Likewise, in the world, sin caused man to lose his position of happiness in the garden and fall in death, and while men struggled on amid the mighty current and surging waves of sin, the rope has been thrown out, the life boat —Jesus—has been sent down, and the good news, with exhortations has been given, to "lay on eternal life." Many may trust in their "god of reason," or "god of nature," or any of the gods of the world, but can they save?

What saith the Scripture: "There is none other name under heaven given, among men, whereby we must be saved; I am the way, the truth, the life." Says the apostle, this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life. Again, and this is the record—that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. So, Paul says, "Lay hold on eternal life." But say you, "I fear I shall make a failure," and come short of duty. But don't you know "that you will surely fail out of Christ? Your whole life shall be but a failure unless you obey the commands and lay hold of Jesus by faith in his saving, healing, soul purifying power and redeeming grace. Lay hold of the blessed hope of life and immortality, to be enjoyed soon by the ransomed host of the Lord, then you may live forever."

How many broken families there may be, and sorrowful parting of loved friends at that last day, just because they will not "lay hold" of Christ. "Two shall be in the field, one taken the other left." Dear reader, "the judgment day is hastening on, the appointed hour draws near," when your destiny will be decided by the decision you make now; full provisions have been made to save mankind if they will accept of it. If a man on a sinking ship at sea refuses to take passage in the life-boat to shore he may perish, but it is his own choice.

The solemn question comes to us, Am I in Christ; does he dwell in me? The great life-boat has been sent off from the shining shores of the land of bliss, to take us from a sinking world of sin, sorrow and destruction, to mansions of bliss and glory in the world soon to come. Shall we lay hold, may the good news be carried to heaven from many perishing souls, that their answer is, "I will, I will lay hold; I want eternal life."

A Queer Thought.

An orthodox paper issued from Louisville, has been publishing a series of "Bible Lessons," for Sunday schools, and indulges in a few "thoughts" on Mat. 9: 1–8, one of which is, "That Christ is really and truly God, and can forgive the sins of those who come and ask him with faith."

Now, we very much fear that they have asserted what needs to be proven; and the assertion that Christ and the Father are one, lays the groundwork for conclusions which they would not wish to accept. For this same orthodox organ teaches that Christ died—was crucified, buried, and rose again the third day—for our sins, thereby forcing upon us the conclusion that if God and Christ were one, then the universe was during the intervening period between the crucifixion and the resurrection without a Savior or a ruler, —both having been put to death by the Roman soldiers. But this brief suggestion will produce other and like thoughts in the mind of the careful Bible student, who can trace out the train at leisure.

As to the last clause of the "thought," we are promised a priest who shall be to us a High Priest and Mediator. As the high priest of Israel waited before the Lord in the temple and sought forgiveness for the sins of the people, so shall Christ wait before the Father, seeking for his people the forgiveness of their transgressions—the antitype of the ancient formula.

In the case cited by Matthew, we see Christ performing his usual acts of healing the sick, etc.; and in v. 5, he asks his accusers whether it is easier to tell the man his sins were forgiven, or to say to him arise and walk.—The sins forgiven being those committed against physical nature, and of such a degree as to produce in this case palsy, and when the sins were forgiven—the cause of the affliction removed—the man was made whole. But theology of the day is based upon such jumping at conclusions, irregardless of consequences. We must take the Word in its entirety, a grand, harmonious message; and it everywhere speaks of Christ as the Mediator between God and man, and that all forgiveness granted man the aggressor, comes from God the aggrieved, through the mediation of the High Priest.

Yours in hope of such intercession.

Curious Statistics of Marriages, Births, Etc.

BY REV. D. SHEPHERDSON, D. D.

Of all the nations of Europe, Ireland leads is the annual average number of marriages, having one to each ninety of inhabitants. Tuscany is the 28th, or other extreme, having one marriage to each 143. Between come France the 16th, with one to 122, and England the 27th, with one to 137. In England, as in the United States, marriage is usually left to the choice of the parties themselves, while in France it is chiefly settled by the parents. There a man of sixty can not marry without the consent of his parents, or established proof that this has been asked and refused without good reasons.

It is a curious fact that the number of marriages has relatively diminished all through Europe about ten per cent in a century. This is a fact of great importance, worthy of profound investigation. If it is the result of loose views of infidelity, or of our more extravigent way of liveing, it demands careful attention.

The relative number of births has diminished in a greater ratio. In 1770, the annual births in France averaged one to 25; in 1870, 1 to 35, a diminution of forty per cent. In 1789 her population of twenty-four millions increased by 970,000 births, against 650,000 with a present population of thirty-seven millions. Her birth rate is only 1 to 39, while in England it is 1 to 30, and in Germany 1 to 25. Among the native population of the United States the birth-rate has been diminshing fearfully for half a century. The causes are not few. Far too many wives are too proud to bear children and mothers are murderers. Even Chrstians seem sometimes to conive at sin. There is guilt upon us. Dress and artificial ways of life and death cause too many sickly woman and threaten the very extinction of society. Teachers, preachers, medical men, and all interested in the welfare of society, should more carefully study facts and tendencies and cry aloud for REFORM, REFORM.

Medical View of Spiritualism.

Of all mental ailments, none seem to yield to treatment as reluctantly as spiritualism. I have watched many cases of genuine spiritualism, but do not remember to have seen a chronic case permanently cured. I have seen typical cases pass regularly through their successive stages and terminate in open insanity, and have never been able to mitigate the symptoms nor avert the result. Spiritualism is the most unpromising complaint with which the psychologist is called to meet. No epidemic of modern times can compare with it. It is a delusion which has existed twenty-five years, and attacked in the United States alone nearly three million people. The last census informs us that there are in the Republic twenty-four thousand insanes setting aside idiots; and it is believed that out of this number seven thousand, five hundred cases may be traced directly to spiritualism. The delusion does not appear to be decreasing, though fortunately its victims are now almost altogether from the vulgar and illiterate classes, and scientific men do not seem to be liable to the contagion. It numbers among its victims a few men and woman of talent, and genius, but we venture to say that had they remained free from the disorder up to the present day, they would not now be very susceptible to its influence. The fact is, spiritualism has lost its hold on the higher classes, and is spreading with fearful rapidity among the rude and illiterate. Whole communities are given over to its influence. Its believers have their organizations, places of worship, mediums, books, papers, and asylums; they are as sincere, earnest, and fearless, as were the Flagellants, Lycanthropes, Crusaders of the Middle Ages; but alas! they are even more deranged.—*N. The Christian Life.

Sorrow.

Upon my lips she laid her touch divine,
And merry speech and careless laughter;
She fixed her melancholy eyes on mine,
And would not be denied.

I saw the west wind loose his cloudlets white
In flocks, careering through the April sky,
I could not sing, though joy was at its height,
For she stood silent by.

I watched the lovely evening fade away,
A mist was lightly drawn across the stars;
She broke my quiet dream—I heard her say,
"Behold your prison bars!

"Earth's gladness shall not satisfy your soul—
This beauty of the world in which you live;
The crowning grace that sanctifies the whole,
That I alone can give."

I heard, and shrunk away from her, afraid;
But still she held me, and would still abide.
Youth's bounding pulses slackened and obeyed
With slowly ebbing tide.

"Look thou beyond the evening sky," she said,
"Beyond the changing splendors of the day;
Accept the pain, the weariness, the dread,
Accept, and bid me stay!"

I turned and clasped her close, with sudden strength,
And slowly, sweetly I became aware
Within my arms God's angel stood at length,
White robed, and calm, and fair.

And now I looked beyond the evening star,
Beyond the changing splendors of the day,
Knowing the pain He sends more precious far,
More beautiful than they.

Why are God's Favorites, Man's Favorites?

In this life are found two classes of of human beings, and two grades of happiness. There are those whom God has bountifully blessed, and those whom He has forgotton. One has the pleasure and happiness therefrom of possessing many of the most fascinating gifts given to mortals and added always to these the kindliest smiles and gift of love from man. The other, stinted and limited at birth with talents and abilities, is shuned and frowned upon by most of those they meet. To one, happiness is offered in abundance; while other plans and contrives, sighs and wishes for the bright light of joy to lighten his pathway. Now to whom much is given, of him much is expected. But do we see the one with ten talents giving to his neighbor who has only one talent? No. He sits with content on his brow, admired and praised, and great recipient of man's favors. All bow before him, because God has made him a special heir of nature's bounty, instead of his giving to those less favored of his mighty inheritance. He forgets that many are the passing poor day-laborers, or the humble housewife, economizing her scanty supplies to give to one whom God has already given enough. Why is it that people pass the pale, scarred face with scornful look and give their sweetest smiles to the peerless beauty? Does she that has much need more? Would it not be better to smile on the disconsolate, care-worn face than on the face beaming with happiness? If God has made their life pleasent, need man try to do more? Is it his favorites who need to be cheered by Christmas gifts? I watch the many that come and go from the Christmas tree, and note the ones that oftenest go. Are they the poor laundress and kitchen maid, the blind and lame, the orphan and invalid, the humpback and tawny face? No. God passed by these and so has man. But the bright faces, the graceful figures, the heirs of wealth and renown, come and go ladened and loaded with gifts of love and pride. These are remembered. It seems a pleasure to give to those who have, and a duty to those who have not. But are we not doing these in commemoration of Christ? And did he forget the poor, and halt and despised? Did he bestow his charities only on the great, the rich, and beautiful? Then do we not honor man more than Christ, when we give to the fortunate and forget or neglect the unfortunate? Are we not rejecting the great example given to us when we leave the homeless and motherless to map out their own happiness with out the encouraging of those whom God has generously favored? Think of it and let man's favors fall where they are needed; where they will inspire and lift the gloomy curtain of despair and let in the soft, warm rays which come form the kindness of loving friends.—*Vt. Advent Christian Times.

WM. SHELDON, - EDITOR.

⁂Give your Name, Postoffice, County and State every time you write.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, September 23, 1873.

BR. & SR. SEYMOUR have not yet decided whether they will move to Ill. or not. They have returned to Mich. at least for a time.

THE tent meetings on Ada and W. Lake street, under the supervision of Br. Kinnan, are still being held in spite of the cold evenings. The principal theme is holiness to the Lord.

WE expect to attend the dedication at Arena, Wis., Sept. 26. We shall then learn the present state of Br. Geo. Thomson's health, and be able to report to inquiring friends.

ON the 6th of this month Eld. S. B. Mabey administered the ordinance of baptism in Clinton, Iowa, where he is officiating as pastor at present. Others will soon obey the Lord in this ordinance.

WE met Br. Hastings on his return homeward from a western tour, and heard him preach an excellent sermon in Chicago. We hope it will not be the last time that the western people will have the privilege of listening to him.

BR. L. C. COLLINS will make a tour to Michigan this week to preach the good news of the coming kingdom. He will exert a healthful influence wherever he goes, and do justice to the cause of truth. Remittances for the paper may be made through him.

WE hear good news from the camp meetings recently held in Minn. and Iowa, though they were not unusually large. We think that an element of spiritual health is being infused into the body at large in the west, in spite of some adverse winds; and the western interest will triumph by the help of the Lord.

SOME are desirous to help publish tracts for distribution, who had no heart to help lift the old debt, nor yet to aid the office till after the liquidation of the debt. Such, we trust, will now see their way clear to lend a helping hand. We want to enter upon this work without delay, but do not wish again to get into debt. "A burnt child dreads the fire."

NEW subscribers are coming in more freely than in former years; but still we are not yet half awake to the merits of the question of an enlargement of our subscription list. We can just as well double our list within a few months as not, if all will take hold of the matter in earnest. Brn. who have hitherto been inactive are now promising to go to work with vigor. Who else will get subscribers?

AT the recent Board meeting a resolution was passed that all money received on the pledges should be used only for the purpose of liquidating the debt, no part of it to be used for other purposes, and that it should be applied on the debt as fast as received, to stop interest as speedily as possible; so the way is open for all to redeem their pledges before Jan 1, if they choose—the sooner the better. Some can pay as well now as then—others cannot.

OUR Board meeting, as will be seen by the secretary's report, is in the past, and the paper remains in the hands of the Society. We have already received enough pledges to cover the whole debt, for which we are all grateful; but we trust this stream of generosity will continue to flow till an extra thousand is raised, that we may be able to pay for our paper and other materials in advance, thus saving a fair percentage on our purchases, and also enabling us to enter upon the publication of tracts that are much needed, without plunging into debt again. Let all who have proposed to give, and have delayed sending, now bring up the rear with good heart.

Views of the Jews.

The Jewish people, at the time of the first advent, were expecting the coming of the predicted Messiah to reign as a universal monarch on earth. Says Neander:

> "The Jews expected a Messiah who should be armed with miraculous power in their behalf; free them from civil bondage; execute a severe retribution upon the enemies of the theocratic people, and make them masters of the world in a universal empire, whose glory it was their special delight to set forth."

Says Knapp:

> "At the time of Christ, and previously, the current opinion of the people in Palestine, and indeed, most of the Pharisees and lawyers, was that he would be a temporal deliverer, and a King of the Jews; and indeed, a universal monarch, who would reign over all nations."

Says Brooks:

> "It is quite notorious that the Jews did, in the time of our Saviour, look for a king who should, in an illustrious and glorious manner, inherit the throne of David, reign over Israel, and obtain dominion and possession over all nations."

Their convictions that the promised Messiah should be a ruler on earth was based on prophecy, as is apparent from their reply to King Herod, who had been troubled by the query of the wise men, "Where is he that is born king of the Jews?" When Herod demanded of the Jewish expositors where the Messiah should be born:

> "They said unto him, in Bethlehem of Judea, for thus it is written by the prophet; and thou Bethlehem in the land of Judah, art not least among the princes of Judah, for out of thee shall come a Governor that shall rule my people Israel."

Of the literality and ultimate universality of that kingdom, they had no doubt; but they had not learned the fact that its chronological location was subsequent to the resurrection, the judgment and the second advent of the Messiah; indeed they were totally blind to the fact of a second advent, having imbibed the impression that the kingdom would come in close proximity with the Messiah's introduction into the world; and this wrong impression was one reason why they respected Jesus as the promised Immanuel. Had they learned from their own Scriptures, as they ought to have done, that the Messiah was to make one mission to die for the race, then to ascend on high, and afterwards to return to judge the race and establish the kingdom, they would never have rejected Jesus. They stumbled for the lack of knowledge that was within their grasp, and which they might have possessed. They rejected Christ because he did not come at first as a King, and Christ in turn rejected them. He told them when his kingdom was due: "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory."

Power of the Religious Press.

Among the many mighty agencies for the accomplishment of good among men, the religious press occupies a prominent place. But the extent of its power is measured by the number of the people to which it gains access. We ought to seriously consider this, and be moved to enlarge the circulation of our Western paper, and thus augment its sphere of usefulness. It is just as easy to speak to tens of thousands as to tens of hundreds. Read the following from the Interior, and apply the principle to our own specific enterprise:

> Next to the pulpit, the church has in our day no arm of strength at all equal to that of the weekly religious press. Any one who is in the least worthy to undertake to wield its high forces for God and this generation, feels deeply this great truth, and earnestly desires special grace and wisdom from on high, to meet aright the untold responsibilities of his position and his work. But however thoughtful, prayerful and labor-loving the conductors of the weekly religious press may—anywhere—be, their appreciation of its necessity, in its best form of real vital force, to the greatest progress possible of Christ's cause in our times, is but one of the two needful conditions of its highest, actual efficiency. Ministers and people also must, on a large scale, unite with them in full sympathy, and in a strong, broad show of hearts and hands and tongues, in their behalf, or, like other unsupported hopes, however precious in themselves, they must waver and falter and fail, perchance, in their glorious undertaking.
> No one, who loves Christ supremely, should be willing, or even able, to see one of the moral agencies or enterprises, which are dear to him on earth, want any aid or present the least chance of receiving any, at his hands, and be not fly with zealous gladness to render it.
> If parents neglect to place an intelligent, sound religious newspaper in their families, they need not be surprised if they grow up to worldliness and moral ruin. The press is as potent there as in the State. How then can its Christian power be spared? Yet we are informed that it was reported in the late Pres. Gen. Assembly, that there were 40,000 families in that denomination in the United States which took no Christian paper! And is there a less per cent in any other?
> This again illustrates the disastrous mistake of the church in our times. Only the home papers of any kind ever reach the homes of the people generally; and the world knows better than to attempt it. It will be well for Christians to continue the inquiry, "How to reach the masses."

Devotion.

Prayer meetings will be kept up where there is an ardent relish for them upon the part of a respectable minority in any community. When the prayer meeting is suffered to expire, it is an omen of a low stage of spirituality in the locality where it occurs. The way to keep up prayer meetings is to attend them on principle, because they are of Divine appointment, even when it is not convenient to do so; and the way to make them profitable is to take part in the exercises on principle, whether you feel like it or not. Feeling will come when we obey God.

The Last Days.

The "last days" of whatever may be specified, indicates the closing portion of its history, whether reference is made to a man's life, or the existence of a kingdom. In the Scriptures, allusion is sometimes made to the last days of the world's history, and sometimes to the last days of the Christian dispensation. Peter and Paul proclaimed the fact that the last days had commenced in their time—that is, the last days of the world's history: "It shall come to pass in the last days saith God; I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh." (Acts 2:17.) "Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." (Heb. 1:2.) If the last days of the world's history had dawned over 1800 years ago, there is no escape from the conclusion that we are near their termination. Some forty-two centuries had then rolled away, and eighteen more have since passed. Where are we? When a man is in the last days of his life he is always in the third stage, or last third of his pilgrimage; so, when the world entered its "last days," it was in the third stage, or last third of its history. Then, if forty-two centuries had gone when the "last days" had begun, how many more might be expected to pass? This conclusion alone establishes the fact that we are on the eve of a new dispensation. Added to this, numerous chains of prophecy proclaim, with unfailing precision, our nearness to a new era. This great truth must be prominently kept before the people, in spite of the scoffer's cry, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

Family Worship.

How sadly it is neglected on every hand, and even sometimes among our own people; and when attended to, how often it is cruelly perverted, and reduced to a heartless formality. An exchange thus speaks on this point:

> There ought to be no sweeter hour in the day than that in which come the morning meal and family worship. Yet it is sorrowful to see what sometimes passes for the latter. A chapter of the Bible hurried through, stereotyped prayer mumbled over, and the participants rush off to the work which they enjoy a great deal better. The exercise is wrapped up in fog, instead of being crowned with heaven's light. It is a mistake to suppose that fluency or education are especially needed in conducting family worship. It wants a heart most of all. Let there not be a single petition that is not born of real desires—even if the prayer be not two minutes long. Blessed be the home where the spirit of song dwells and adds its charm to the morning worship! The exercise need not be long, but it should not be crowded. Break up the formality; carry all the soul-life you have into it; and its savor shall not go through the day alone, but among all the home memories none shall be stronger to hold the grown up children to the faith of their fathers.

How to Preach.

All ministers flatter themselves that they know how; but perhaps a little advice may not be unworthy of attention. The following note is clipped from an exchange:

> Rev. W. H. H. Murray, of Boston, has been giving his idea of preaching. He thinks that all true oratory roots itself in conversation; that this is the acorn within whose contracted shell the magnificent tree exists in germinal form. "Animated conversation," he contends, "is eloquence; mouthing and spouting a long string of words is not." He favors extemporaneous preaching, and gives a recipe as to how to succeed. "Do not attempt too much," he says. "Never expect or plan to make a great speech. Indeed, do not try to make a speech at all; simply begin to talk. Look upon your audience whether it be small or great, as a circle of friends that have met to have you give them, in a simple, conversational form of utterance, your views upon a certain matter; and do, please, look your listeners in the eye. A preacher who will not look his hearers in the eye will fail."

Worldly Conformity.

It has been well said, "There is no greater mistake than to suppose that Christians can impress the world by agreeing with it." This joining affinity with the world, to win the world, is poor policy—and poorer principle. It is virtually saying, "Let us do evil that good may come." As a matter of policy, instead of winning the world, it is conforming to the world. As a matter of principle, it is a direct violation of the sacred injunction, "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind." Said Christ, "Ye are not of the world: I have chosen you out of the world." Then let us stay out, and repel its carnal attractions, and live above its sensual fascinations. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature."

The Measure of Love to God.

Our love for God and his cause can be measured by what we do financially to honor him and to build up his cause among men; provided, we possess earthly stores; for it is impossible for any heart to be filled with unfeigned love for the great God of heaven and see his cause languish for aid we might render. Shall Christians love mammon more than God? How few really make a financial sacrifice for God. How many withhold from him even their surplus funds, and see the cause languish!

Are You in Arrears?

Look at the date printed on your paper, or on the wrapper, and if it is not dated ahead of the present day and month of the present year, you are owing the office. Remember that our rules require advance payment. If you are paid up to present date, it is time to again pay ahead. If you are not paid up to the present, it is high time to pay up past dues, and also time to pay ahead besides. Though we are too lenient to cut off subscribers as soon as their time runs out, none should take advantage of this leniency to run in debt, and thus embarrass the office; for these many small sums amount to a large sum at the office. Let all remember the advance pay terms, and wheel into line as soon as possible.

Spirit Pictures.

Wisconsin can boast of having on exhibition a picture of the ghost of a child that died when two or three years old, which is now full grown in the spirit land, is married, and has become the mother of two children. Surely she cannot be in that world mentioned by the Saviour, where they "neither marry, nor are given in marriage." Just think! little ghosts growing to be big ghosts, getting married, and raising a family of ghosts in the spirit land, and then have to come back here to get their pictures taken; and after they are taken they have to leave them here, for they are such feeble creatures that they have not strength enough to take a picture away—weak creatures of imagination.

Board Meeting.

The Board of W. A. C. Publishing Society met this day, Sept. 16, 1873, according to notice previously given, and organized. Darius Mathewson, President of the Society, in the chair. Frank Burr, the Secretary, being absent, Geo. Howard was elected Secretary, pro tem.

Members of the Board present: D. Mathewson, William Sheldon, A. W. Tucker, S. Raymond, L. C. Collins and George Howard.

Pledges for the payment of the "old debt" having come in so freely there was no thought in the minds of the Board as to any change of base; and, after arranging the business of the Society quite satisfactorily to all present, the meeting adjourned, the members feeling that a brighter day has dawned upon our publishing interest in the West. And now, brethren, let us see what we can do—more than we have done in the past—for the further advancement of the Master's cause. The cry comes to us from all over the West, "Send us tracts—more tracts;" and we daily, almost, hear something of how much good these little messengers have done by introducing the truth where there are no other preachers. A few shillings from each one of us in his direction may be the means of saving many to enjoy eternal life in the soon-coming kingdom. Brethren, let us wake up to duty. We profess to believe that the Lord is soon coming; let us act so that when he does come, he will say, "well done." May the Lord help us. Amen.

GEO. HOWARD, Sec'y pro tem.

MARTIN LUTHER gave some good advice to a preacher of the gospel, which is not altogether out of date: "Let all thy sermons be of the simplest. Look not to the princes; but to the simplest, unwise, rude, and unlearned people; for the prince is made of the same stuff. If I, in my sermons, were to regard Philip Melancthon and the other doctors, I should do no good; but I preach in the simplest way to the unlearned, and that pleases all. (I keep the Hebrew and Greek for the times when we learned men are alone together. Then we talk such crabbed stuff they may well wonder at us in heaven.)" The profound disquisitions that are sometimes delivered in the pulpit, to promiscuous congregations, might better be reserved for the time when "we learned men are alone."

The Gospel of Mark has just been put in circulation in Japanese and meets with a ready sale.

"This Generation Shall Not Pass."

J. D. CAREY.

"Verily, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled.—(Matt. 24:34.)

Although Jesus did not know the day or the hour of his second advent, he did know the generation in which it would occur, and imparted that knowledge to his church, and bade us know when it is near—when certain events were seen, which he described. Now is it right or wrong for us to watch for "these things," that we may know when the kingdom of God is near?

Men tell me we are not to know anything at all about the time of the second advent; that we cannot know when he is near. Jesus tells us when to know it is nigh. Which shall we follow? the commandments of men or of Jesus? If men, then let us throw away the Bible; but if Jesus, then let us throw aside the teachings of men and follow the teachings of Christ. Jesus spoke of a certain generation that should not pass, till all should be fulfilled. My orthodox friends say this present generation is not the one he meant, but some other. They don't profess to know what generation he did mean, but they are positive he did not mean this. Let us see if we can ascertain what generation he did mean. It is quite obvious he meant the last one—the one that should not pass, till all is fulfilled. What is included in this "all?" Just preceding this declaration he stated what should take place: "And they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." So that event is included in "all these things," and must be fulfilled before the generation passes of which he was speaking. Is that generation the present one? If so, when did it begin and when will it end? Jesus had described a great tribulation, through which the church must pass, and adds: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in the heavens." We are then commanded, when these things are seen, to know it is near—at the door—that the generation seeing them should not pass till all would be fulfilled. Everybody at all acquainted with history, knows of the great tribulation—the great persecution—the martyr age in which seventy-five millions of Christians sealed their faith with their blood. It is well known that this great tribulation was almost entirely suspended as early as 1760, just at the time this event might have been expected, "IMMEDIATELY AFTER the tribulation," the sun was supernaturally darkened, and it matters not what caused the darkening, as it is the event itself, and not the cause that concerns us. Men at this time are ready to give a reason, but the most learned and the scientific of those days could give no reason for it. Astronomers knew of no eclipse. The sun was simply "darkened," as the Saviour said it would be. All faces gathered blackness, and many thought the day of judgment had come. It was not that, but it was one of the three great signs Jesus gave of its near approach, and was so announced from the pulpits of New England. The following night the moon simply refused to give light at her full. According to history that must have been the darkest night ever known. In 1833, the stars fell, or what was known as such, and what the Saviour undoubtedly meant by the expression; and the next event is the sign of the Son of Man and his appearing, and he distinctly informs us, "When ye see these things come to pass, know it is near—even at the doors. This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled;" or, according to Luke, "Lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." Now it is evident he was speaking of a generation that should witness "these things;" or why say, "when ye see these things?" The generation he was then addressing did not see what he described. They did not see the great tribulation, therefore they could not have seen "these things" that were to take place after the tribulation. But this present generation did witness the end of the tribulation. It also witnessed the events that were to occur immediately afterwards, so it is the one that shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven. Now, how much longer is "this generation" to run, or when will it end? One hundred years is a Bible generation; therefore, one hundred years from the 19th of May, 1780, when the first sign was seen, would reach to the 19th day of May, 1880; but as "this generation" is not to pass, so the 19th of May, 1880, can never come. At some point of time between this and that time, Jesus will be revealed from heaven. There only remains a little over six years of this generation which cannot pass. "The Scriptures cannot be broken." The heavens and the earth shall pass away, but his word shall not pass away.

The revelator saw the same events. Under the fifth seal he saw this great tribulation—the martyr age. He saw the souls of them who were beheaded, or persons of them who were beheaded, and they cried: "O Lord, how long?" And they were told to rest a little season; and then comes the darkening of the sun, or it became as "sackcloth," and the moon refused to give her light, or the moon became as blood, and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth." What next? Why, then "the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together." "For the great day of his wrath has come, and who shall be able to stand?" O, why will people be so blind as not to see the near approach of the great day? It cannot possibly be further off than a little over six years, and it may not be as many days or hours. Yes, dear reader, while you read these lines the seventh trump, which is the last, may sound. At the last trump the dead in Christ are to rise incorruptible, and we are to be changed. Are we ready to be changed—ready for translation? Let us not be deceived, as some will be, but let us put on Christ, and stand ready and waiting for his glorious appearing, so soon to take place. Amen.

Advantage of the Press.

C. C. M.

Few realize the value of a weekly religious newspaper. The following conversation between the editor of the Watchman and Reflector and a rustic who had not seen such a paper for a year aptly illustrates this fact:

> It was laughable enough to hear the man talk of matters of world-wide moment, but of the nature of which he knew nothing, except what he had gathered up at the "store at the corner." Such ignorance and such assumption of knowledge, such profound wisdom in judgment, and such vast respect for his own opinion, it was marvelous to behold. Somehow he got to talking on the missionary question. He soon astounded us with the assertion that he "didn't believe a cent's worth in the whole missionary business." He declared that every missionary in "Chinee" and the rest of heathendom, and every convert made through them, was being killed as fast as the natives found them. He doubted the morality of the whole thing. It wasn't right for him to give his money and "help send his fellowmen out there to be butchered." And then again he thought the heathen were better off in their ignorance. "They wouldn't be condemned, because they didn't know nothing; but if you gave them the gospil, those that won't take it will be lost. Better let them be." It was the most prodigious plea for ignorance that we had ever listened to. Well, we thought, there is no way of accounting for such a density of ignorance, and such bluntness in moral sentiment, only from the fact that the man is living and dying without a religious newspaper beneath his roof. A single column of missionary intelligence, such as is found in any religious journal in the land, would open up to this benighted soul the whole grandeur of the work, its rapid advances, its great victories. His soul would kindle under the survey, and his entire nature would put itself into sympathy with the greatest of all Christian enterprises. With how much more of faith and fervor, and great, generous spirit and hope, would the man lead his brethren in prayer! How much larger a man every way, how much nobler a Christian he would be, were he reading week by week his religious paper, keeping himself fully abreast with the best thoughts and activities of the great world which begins just beyond the range of hills which surrounds him.

Trouble.

Trouble is more frequently made than sent. If every person would take the world as it is—its joys and sorrows—and yield at once an humble reconciliation to what is unaviodable, there would be far more happiness, and infinitely less misery than there is. Six thousand years' experience ought to convince mankind that there are clouds here as well as sunshine, and the man who starts life with the expectation that everything before him will be smooth and uninterrupted, is a dreamer who knows nothing of the world's realities. Wealth cannot shield us from disappointment and affliction, and poverty is not as heavy on the heart as the cares brought on by the possession of uncounted riches.

We cannot keep death away from our door, no matter how faithful we may gard its portal: nor can we so control the mind and disposition of others that the most tender ties and associations are not at times snapped asunder. Let us take matters as they come, and try to be content. If we are prosperous, we should rejoice and give God the praise. If we fail in our enterprise and find our plans of business dwarfed and thwarted, let us submit coolly to the visitation, and try again, with renewed hope and effort. There is no use lamenting, when lamentations will do no good— or shedding tears, when they only tend to heighten our sorrows. The grave will soon cover our troubles, and there is a happy life beyond, which we can make our own, no matter how the world treats us.

Great Telescopes.

The United States boasts of the largest refracting telescope in the world, the object glass of which they have recently purchased in England. It is a twenty-five inch glass, magnifying three thousand times, and bringing our vision, to all intents and purposes, to within a distance of eighty miles from the moon. The construction of a lens of this kind is a work of the most laborious and difficult nature, it being absolutely necessary that the glass should be of uniform density, perfectly pelucid, and free from even the smallest flaw. The telescope to which this glass belongs is made of steel, with an inner zinc tube, the whole mounted on a pillar twenty-nine feet in hight, and weighing not less than five tons. The next largest telescope is placed in the Observatory in Chicago, and has an object-glass eighteen inches and a half in diameter. The two next largest have object-glasses of fifteen inches and a half in diameter, and they are situated at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and at the Observatory of Pulkowa, in Russia. The most gigantic of telescopes, however, is still unfinished, though now rapidly approaching completion. The object-glass for this instrument will have a diameter of twenty-seven inches, and will alone cost $50,000. It is being manufactured for the government of the United States, and will probably be placed on an astronomical station to be established by the Coast Survey Bureau on the Sierra Navada mountains. It will thus be situated at a hight of from seven to ten thousand feet above the level of the sea, in an atmosphere of wonderful purity, and comparatively free from clouds. That the establishment of this great instrument will add greatly to our knowledge of physical astronomy connot be doubted, but it may reasonable be doubted whethe any telescope will enable us, as has been recently suggested, to settle by direct optical proof whether the the moon is inhabited or not.

Prayer.

Has not the church almost to learn yet what is the power of prayer? What conception have we of believing prayer before which mountains depart? What of persevering prayer, which causes us to stand continually upon the watch tower in the day time, and which sets us in our ward whole nights? What of importunate prayer, which storms heaven with its violence and force? What of united prayer, gathering us together to ask help of the Lord? What of constant prayer, which regards no iniquity in our hearts? What of practical prayer, which fulfills itself?

Let such prayers be understood; let our spirit but break with such longing, and the expectations of our bosoms shall not be delayed. "And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear."—Dr. J. Hamilton.

TRUTHFULNESS.—It is not what people eat, but what they digest, that makes them strong; it is not what they gain, but what they save, that makes them rich; it is not what they read, but what they remember, that makes them learned; it is not what they profess, but the practice, that makes them righteous. These are very plain and important truths, too little heeded by gluttons, spendthrifts, bookworms and hypocrites. Truth is the foundation of instruction, and habitual regard for it is absolutely necessary. He who walks by the light of it has the mid-day sun; he who would spurn it goes forth amid clouds and darkness.

JESUS loves us with an everlasting love. He so loved us that he gave his precious life to save us. The more I think of his love, the deeper my love is for him. We do not realize how much he loves us, or we could not so often grieve him by our wanderings.

—A dispatch from Shreveport New Orleans, received September 14. reports the arrival of nurses and physicians at that place. The disease is pronounced the genuine yellow fever, in an epidemic form. There has been no abatement to-day. There are now fully 600 sick with the fever. Twenty-nine died within the last twenty-four hours.

—The following dispatch was received at Memphis on the 15th. from Shreveport: The yellow fever is unabated and the distress it the city indiscribable. Of six men in our telegraph office five, have taken the fever and two are already dead. Interments average thirty or fourty daily, in the population of not over 4,000. Physicians and nurses are worked out.

The people of the entire country should know these terrible facts and send aid to this suffering city.

—At Memphis Tenn., September 15, the wildest rumors prevailed in regard to the yellow fever, and the trains leaving on the various roads were crowded with people fleeing from the scourage. It is difficult to obtain reliable date in regard to the spread of the disease, but it is quite certain that it has made its appearance in various portions of the city, and is no longer confined to Pinch The board of Health to-night has returns from only two undertakers, who report twelve interments, nine of the deaths being from yellow fever.

Irvin, who confessed to know all about the murder of Benjamin Nathan, and who has been indicted by the Grand Jury for a burglary in Chatham street. The utmost retirence is observed by the Officials in regard to the affair, but it is stated Irvin knows more about the murder than it would be prudent to divulge at present, and that should he not have been actually engaged in the crime, he has in his possession facts which will lead to the conviction of the real criminals.

AIR VOYAGE TO EUROPE.

—The great balloon built by the Daily Graphic Company of New York to enable Profs. Wise and Donaldson to carry out their experiment of an air voyage across the Atlantic, was completed last week, and was placed on exhibition at Capitoline Grounds last Satuday. The balloon was to sail from the same place on Wednesday of last week, and ere this paper reaches all its readers the experiment will have proved a success, or resulted in failure. The balloon when inflated is 335 feet in curcumference, and 160 feet high. It contains 4,316 yards of cloth, required ten miles of sewing and weighs 7,000 pounds, and cost $15,000. It is furnised with every convenience, the car being roomy enough for four persons, with supplies sufficient for several days, although the voyage is expected to be made in less than three days. In view of the possibility of accident to the balloon two life boats have been provided.

—The propeller Ironsides, of the Engelmann line, connecting with the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad, and one of the largest steamers on the lakes, foundred and sunk seven miles off this port at noon Sept. 15. Her signal of distress was hoisted at 9 a. m. but so terible was the sea and heavy the wind no assistance could reach her. She labored in the trough of the sea from about half-past eight a. m. until the time she sunk. The passengers and crew prepared the boats to leave her about half past ten o'clock, and the last boat left her at ten minuts to twelve. When the last boat had got about a quarter of a mile from her she went down. One boat, containing five men and four women, capsized and only one man of the party reached shore. Four boats have reached shore up to this time. One boat, containing Captain Sweetman, and wife, and five passengers, has not yet been heard from. It is feared they are among the lost. Thirty-two persons are known to have been saved, and fourteen bodies have been recovered. The following is a list of the drownded, whose dodies have been recovered and identified: John Driscoll, steward of the boat; John Hales, of Milwaukee; Charles Winmell, agent of C. E. Harling & Co., New York; Mrs. H. A Valentine and child, of Milwaukee; A. S. Donelson, of Grand Rapids; Mrs. J. B. L. Dewitt, of Milwaukee.

—The most wide-spread conflagration which has visited Chicago since the never-to-be forgotten October of 1871, though not the most serious in a pecuniary point of view, occurred on the afternoon of Sept. 17. The flames broke out in a large twostory frame building at the intersection of Newberry avenue and the tracks of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, as is supposed from the sparks of a locomotive which was passing. In the building it seems was a car-load of hay and a lot of bale hay, and among this material the flames originated. At the time a very high breeze prevailed from the southwest and soon fanned the flames into most formidable proportions. In less than five minutes from the moment of the discovery of the fire, the warehouse was one mass of crackling, hissing flame and the hundreds of tons of baled hay stored in the building became fused, as it were, into a solid, extensive hill of fire. The alarm was sounded at a quarter before 3 o'clock, and before the engines could reach the distant locality not only was the building in which the fire had originated completely in the possession of the flames, but several adjacent structures, all rickety and dry as old bones, had caught on fire and were wrapped in the hot embrace of the destroying element. It was then found necessary to turn in a second, and then a third and, subsequently, a fourth alarm, summoning all available fire apparatus in the city to the scene of destruction, as another dreadful fiery visitation seemed imminent.

While the fire was in progress everybody for more than a mile around, expecting the flames might reach their premises, packed up their goods and made preparations for departure. The excitement naturally was intense, and the scene was similar to that, only, of course, on a largely-reduced scale, which characterized the "doings and goings" in the North Division, on Fire Monday, 1871.

ABROAD.

—Senor Figueras arrived in Madrid Sept. 17th

—Carlist bonds are quoted on the Frankfort Bourse.

—Paris September 17.—M. F. D, Arblay, senior is dead.

—General Moriones has been appointed Generalissimo of the armies of Saain.

—Intelligence has been received that disturbances have occurred on the Island of Majorca.

—The Minister of War in Spain has been authorized to receive 30,000 rifles, which were tendered by the public for the Government forces.

—Henry Bouverie and William Brand, Speaker of the British House of Commons, and his family sail for the United States on Saturday Sept. 20th to remain two months.

—The leaders of the Cartagena insurrection in Spain are endeavoring to secure the co operation of the Carlists in their efforts to raise the siege of the city. They have made propositions to the Carlists to attack the Republicans in the rear while the besieged make a sortie.

—A number of emigrants who left England for Brazil have returned, bringing doleful accounts of their treatment in the country. They declare that they have experienced great hardships ever since their departure from their homes, and that the promises made to them by the agents of the Brazilian Government in this country were flagrantly broken.

—Private dispatches received in Madrid Sep. 15 deny the truth of the report, given currency by the Carlists, that the Republican troops in the North, under General Santapan Loma, have met with a severe defeat by the insurrectionists. On the contrary, they state that the engagement resulted in a victory for the Government forces, the Carlists being defeated with great slaughter. The number of insurrectionists engaged in the battle was 14,000, while that of the Republicans was 10,000.

—AFRICA OPENING TO MISSION LABOR.—King Gilla Somer, king of the Gola country, still a young man, recently visited Liberia, and ardently begs for a missionary, "a God man," as he says, "who will teach my people the religion of Jesus Christ." He offers to protect the missionary, will observe the Sabbath, do all he can to get his people to attend the religious services, give every facility in his power to have the children go to School, and will give 3,000 acres of land, and more if required, to the use of the mission.

Correspondence.

Annual Meeting of the S. W. Iowa Conference.

The meeting began Sept. 4, at the school house, near Milford, Montgomery County, Iowa, but the business was transacted, and services in great part were held in Br. John Grice's grove, across the line, in Cass County. The attendance was not so large as at our camp meetings heretofore, but yet a good representation was present; the people in the vicinity turned out pretty well.

Preaching brethren present were Brn. Kent, Hubbel, Blanchard, Patton, McClure and Morphy.

Br. J. A. Komig was re-elected President; Br. D. O. Hink was elected Vice President; Br. W. Morphy, Secretary; Br. D. Q. Kent, Treasurer, re-elected.

After the usual reports, which were not so encouraging as formerly, but yet hopeful, the matter of putting an evangelist in the field was again taken up. Three hundred and seventeen dollars was pledged on the ground, towards supporting one for a year. We expect to be able to add to it until it shall be $500. A committee of one in each church was appointed to obtain pledges and solicit money to this end, who are instructed to see to the matter at once and report success to Br. K. W. Macomber, at Lewis, Cass County, Iowa. The following brethren were appointed, and will consider themselves hereby instructed: Brn. Patton, Nodaway Church, Iowa; A. Slater, Troublesome Creek, Iowa; Hubbell, Penn Centre, Iowa; Grice, Noble Township, Iowa; Collins, Waveland, Iowa; Macomber, Lewis, Iowa; Mears, Greenfield, Iowa, Prier, Arbor Hill, Iowa; Hamilton, Hamburg, Iowa; Jones, Maryville, Mo.; Smith, Quitman, Mo.; Huls, Clear Creek, Mo.; Teller, Highland, Mo. They are to inform Br. Macomber, as soon as possible, what they can raise; and they are to be prepared to pay over to the Treasurer one quarter of the amount at the first quarterly after the evangelist comes into the field. Brethren Macomber, Collins and Morphy were chosen a committee to correspond with the evangelist. Will Br. Thurber let us know where he is? And if he could come as evangelist?

The meeting was harmonious throughout. The Lord's supper was administered Sabbath afternoon, a goodly number partaking. We were all benfited by coming together.

Wm. Morphy, Secretary.

Report

Of the Advent Christian Conference of Northern Pennsylvania and Southern New York, held at Fremont, Steuben county, N. Y., Sept. 5 and 6

The meeting commenced Thursday evening, September 4, and continued over Sabbath, during which time there were eight sermons preached by different brethren, which set before the people our "faith" and "hope," in a clear and comprehensive manner. Saturday afternoon, after the preaching, we enjoyed one of those heavenly conference meetings, when the spirit of God descended with its melting power, which was felt by all present. Surely, if we could have seen Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, we should have thought we were in the kingdom of heaven. Although we did not feel like making any "tabernacle," having one already built, large enough for all present, yet we did feel like staying in that one, if it could have been possible, till the pealing echoes of the archangel's trump should call us to those manisons built by hands Divine.

The following ministers were present, and helped preach the word: Elds. E. C. Cowles, Benj. Butler, D. B. Hunt, E. H. Eggleston, J. W. Taylor, A. H. Briggs and D. Cogswell. These all reported laboring in the gospel, as health and circumstances will admit. Br. J. T. Ongley reported by letter of labors with the tent.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: E. C. Cowles, President; E. H. Eggleston, Vice President; J. W. Taylor, Secretary, and Sylvenus Gardner, Treasurer.

On Saturday afternoon a large number, with mingled sorrow and joy partook of the emblems of the broken body and spilled blood of the dear Redeemer, feeling confident that the vacant chair will soon be filled by him who said, "If I go away I will come again." May the waiting Bride be ready to welcome the invitation, "Enter thou into thy chambers."

J. W. Taylor, Secretary.

From J. S. Lowrance, Centreville, Texas.

I hope you will not think my pledge too small. I am [illegible] this world's goods, and have a family [illegible] support by hard labor. I want to do all I can to promulgate the gospel of pure Christianity, and I think there is nothing better to advance the truth than that noble defender of the faith, The Advent Times. I cannot do without it; I am alone here in the faith; it is my preacher, teacher and comforter. Hoping that The Times may remain in the hands it is in, I am yours in the one faith.

From Eld. D. S. Clark, West Point, Ill.

Dear Br. Sheldon.—This morning finds us well, and willing to labor for the Master. We came to this place and commenced our meetings September 11; have had a good hearing thus far, and some interest; hope, by the blessing of God, to help some to make a start for the kingdom; pray for us. Br. Hurd is with us. Some are to be baptized to day; may the Lord help them to come. Expect to be in Springfield, Ill., on the 24th of this month, and stay over Sunday. Yours as ever, in hope.

From Margery Huff, Percenter Iowa.

Dear brethren and sisters of The Times, let us join in with Sr. M. A. Tibbets. She says many hands make light work; now let us all put our shoulder to the wheel, and the more that take hold the easier it will roll. I cannot give up The Times, I take so much comfort in reading the letters of our dear brothers and sisters that are scattered up and down in the world; although we are strangers here we shall know each other in the kingdom if we are only faithful, for he is faithful that promised. O, what a glorious thought; we shall soon meet him who is able to wipe away all tears. What a glorious prospect to be ever with the Lord!

From Cynthia Benjamin.

We hail with delight every indication, whatever it may be, that tells us the time is drawing nigh when the Master shall return, for we long to get home, as longs the weary traveler for a sight of his native hills. How thrills the heart, how kindles the eye at the indications that we are almost there. O, almost there; yes, our long, weary journey is near its close; a few more prayers to be said, a little more work perchance to be done, and we will speed us away to the better land, join those old heroes, whom no danger could intimidate, no difficulty overcome. And now the Lord make strong our hearts and our hands, that we be able to work faithfully while the day lasts, and be counted of him worthy to escape the things that are coming on the earth, and to stand before the Son of Man.

From Wm. H. Hill, Huntsville, Mo.

We received the pledge in The Times, asking for help to pay the debt of the Society. We are ever ready to help the cause of Christ and the noble brethren who are proclaiming the gospel of the kingdom. I am in bed while I write this note. I am afflicted with a weak back. We are poor as for this world's goods. The crop here is almost a failure. We can't see how we are to live till another crop is raised. We live on corn bread and water the most of the time, but the Lord will provide some way for us. We will send you a helping hand, and will send more, if the Lord will spare us, before the first of January. We would like to correspond with some of our brethren if they will give us their address in The Times. We are all alone here. We would like to live where we could go to meeting with those of like faith.

From D. W. Favor, Springville, Wis.

Br. Favor sends us pledges to the amount of $35, for himself and others, and then adds: We are somewhat an isolated church, but we are trying the best we can to make our calling and our election sure. We have regular preaching once in two weeks, by Eld. Jobe Brown, who presents God's truth with such a burning, glowing pathos that it sinks deep into the hearts of the people, and I think during his ministrations among us there will be lasting good accomplished. Our present organization numbers twenty-three or twenty-four members. The most of us are poor in regard to this world's goods, but we are always willing to give when God calls upon us, and in such a way as he directs, for we realize that the time is short and the judgment is at hand. We cannot afford to lose a single opportunity for doing good. Now, I would say to our people at large, don't fold your arms and listen to the earnest appeals of our brethren at the office for help and heed it not. We should give according as the Lord prospers us.

From A. A. Judkins, Volga, Ind.

I am not able to add much to what has already been said of us at Volga, only that the truth has made us free, indeed. The Master has promised to come again in like manner as he went away. The angel testified to this, and the Saviour's language is: "And if I go and prepare a place for you I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am ye may be also." Then we shall see him as he is, and if we are permitted to live with him in his kingdom will it not be [illegible] reward for what we endure in [illegible] will. I feel more interested [illegible] than ever before. I want to live so that I may, at last, get into the kingdom—the new earth. I have no desire to go "beyond the bounds of time and space," as many express themselves. Truth is gaining ground in this place, and the orthodox are getting poor under such preaching as I heard at the M. E. Church, August 24. The minister built a man of straw out of the word "nonentity," then tore it down in the same way. He affirmed that there was one judgment, and that in the future; but some would previously be in heaven and some in hell, and still not judged. But I rejoice in the more excellent way as revealed in the sacred page, that Jesus is coming that his reward is with him and his work before him, to give every man according as his work shall be. May we all then receive the gift of eternal life, is the prayer of your young brother in the blessed hope.

From Eld. J. H. May, Arkansas.

Br. Sheldon.—I am permitted to write you a few lines to inform you of our state at this juncture of time. I would just say, that I am still holding on to the faithful word of promise, and am still trying by the grace of God to get others to prepare for the appearing of our Saviour, though I am satisfied by the prophecies and the signs of the times that we are living in what Paul and Daniel call the last days, in which many should depart from the faith and be turned unto fables, so that we cannot look for a great ingathering into the fold of our common Shepherd. Notwithstanding we must, as faithful stewards of the grace of God, still proclaim the gospel of the coming kingdom; for, says the Saviour, "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, and then the end shall come." May God hasten the time when this may be accomplished; when we shall see an end to all wickedness; when the King shall come and take possession of his promised possession; when the ransomed of the Lord shall return to Zion with songs of everlasting joy upon their head; when sorrowing and sighing shall flee away forever and ever.

We are weak here as regards numbers, but we feel strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. We would be delighted to see you, Br. Sheldon, or some other able brother, to break to us the bread of life. I believe that there is a chance for some good to be done in the good cause here. Can you not favor us with a short visit this fall, and preach about two weeks? I think you would be amply sustained. If you can come, answer through The Times when you can come, and I will make arrangements for the meeting, and also for means to remunerate you for your services. O that the Lord of the vineyard would send some able and faithful ministers of the gospel of his grace into our midst. May the Lord bless you and long preserve you even unto his heavenly kingdom is my prayer.

Note.—We cannot yet decide when to visit the Southwest.—Ed. Times.

From J. K. P. Baker, Kansas.

Dear Times.—Sunday, August 24, we went to Neodesha, situated at the confluence of the Verdigris and Fall Rivers, to hear Bishop Bowman preach and dedicate the M. E. Church, a fine brick edifice 32x65 feet. The house was already full, the open windows occupied as seats, and a large crowd outside; yet we found room enough in the shade of the house for our wagon, where, through the open door, we could distinctly see and hear the speaker.

His portrait, as given in the Hearth and Home of June 8, 1872, is not a flattering likeness. The Editor describes him as "an excellent educator, a preacher of great eloquence and popularity, a polished scholar and a refined gentleman." Though too late to hear the text and introduction, we soon discovered the theme to be prayer, and the text Isa. 56:7, l. c. He said that some scientist had proposed to place ten sick persons in one room of a hospital, and ten others in another room, the condition and treatment of those in each room to be equal, but prayers to be offered for the recovery of only those in one room; the result to be considered a scientific demonstration of the efficacy of prayer. This proposition he characterized as an absurd and unscientific speculation, which would take the case out of its own proper department of science and apply to it the laws of another department. Every experiment must be made in conformity with the laws, limitations and conditions of the case. An egg would not hatch, nor a seed sprout until the conditions of the laws of incubation and germination were complied with.

Some seeds had been held in the hand of a mummy for three thousand years, but as soon as moisture and the other conditions of growth were supplied they began to grow. So prayer has its conditions and limitations, and the judge who would determine the guilt or innocence of a prisoner by physical tests is not more unscientific than those who would determine the efficacy of prayer by purely physical tests. If the invalids could possibly be in the same condition, it is contrary to the spirit and teaching of Christianity to pray for only a part.

But every Christian's individual experience, as well as the historic conquest of Christianity are proofs of the power of prayer.

He told of a wounded soldier, who at night was thought to be dying; but in the morning, to the astonishment of himself and comrades he began to mend, and soon recovered. Two weeks after, he received a letter from his brother, which informed him that at a certain time they had an impression that he was in great danger, and they therefore spent the night in prayer for his deliverance, and in the morning felt an assurance that he was safe. That morning was the time he began to recover.

In 1858, during a conference, a telegram was received that Bishop Simpson was dying at Pittsburgh. A season of prayer for the Bishop's recovery was held, and as they rose from their knees one whispered to the other, until it went around the circle, "The Bishop will not die." The impression amounted almost to certainty. At that very time he began to mend, and so marked and sudden was the change that the physician pronounced it a miracle.

The preacher knew numbers of persons once addicted to the enslaving habits of intemperance and using tobacco, who had been enabled to reform in answer to prayer, and he exhorted all who were yet slaves to these vices to make a sincere test of prayer. Such, as near as I can remember, was the substance of the sermon. He had now reached the point of dedication, but the house was not all paid for, and, until they provided for the debt, he could not dedicate the building. A collection in cash was first taken, followed by subscriptions, and thus the debt of about $2,000 was provided for. The Bishop is the most scientific and persistent beggar that I ever heard; and, although he begged 1½ hours by the watch, yet the audience remained unconscious of the flight of time. The names of subscribers as pronounced to the clerk gave the Bishop an opportunity to display a pungent capacity for puns. A. Cole was pronounced "a live coal." Miss Micks was so unfortunate as to get her name "mixed" with others, much to the embarrassment of the clerk, but the ready wit of the Bishop sorted it with a pun. The debt provided for the dedication ceremony was soon over, and we awoke to the consciousness that we were decidedly too late for dinner and a little too early for supper, but with an appetite that begged for both meals at once, and could not afford to be too defferential even to a Bishop at such time.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

Eld. S. K. Gibson writes from Wilton, Iowa.

I have just returned home from the west, where I have been holding meetings. The Lord has blessed our labors. Our last meeting—the grove meeting near Brooklyn—was one of interest. We had a glorious time. Some confessed Christ, and a few were baptized. May the Lord bless you and yours in your labors of love.

J. M. Weagant writes:

Herewith I send my pledge for ten dollars, and I will send ten dollars more in cash, in a few days, God willing. I wish I could send a great deal more for the cause I love so much. I am a poor man, with poor health and a family of small children to support. Still, I trust in the strong arm of God to strengthen and sustain until Christ will come, and may God bless you and the cause for which you labor. Yours in hope.

H. W. Lansing writes:

If for no other than a moral influence now exerted by your publication, it is worthy of being sustained; but the healthful tone of The Times in clearing the theological horizon is every way worthy of the aid of all who may be considered sane on religious topics. It seems to lift the curtain a little, to give us a glimpse of the future glory God has in reserve for those who love him and long for his appearing. Let the light shine till all darkness shall be dispelled by the pure rays of the sun of righteousness. Prejudice—the tyrant—is hard to conquer, but by the light of life it must be subdued and made to yield to reason. God prosper you in your good work.

Mrs. E. E. Goff writes:

I hope each one will do [illegible] and keep the Advent Christian Times in the hand that it now is in. Why is it there is not more interest among the Advent people? Do they believe what they preach? If Jesus is coming soon why are we holding on to our money so fast, instead of trying to spread the glad news around, that others may hear of our soon-coming King? God calls on all to work. We cannot all preach, but we can all give something; and the time to give is when it is most needed, and that time is now. How many can say (and feel it too), that it is more blessed to give than to receive? I can say, and feel it too; may the Lord help each and every one to do their duty, for the time is short.

It is a sweet thought that there is a Friend who sees and marks each secret, bitter tear. He hears the softest sigh breathed from the burthened heart, and is ever ready to strengthen, cheer, and comfort us. O, how dark would the world become, were earth and earthly things our only hope—had we no friend but those as frail and fleeting as ourselves!

Worldly Amusements.

In my early Christian life I heard
Methodist bishop from the south repor fully complied with his requests, and friendship grew up between the pasto

and his parishioner that grew int an intimacy which continued till th

I then enjoyed his society and fou him a pleasant companion. But I s now that I never had any real con

I cannot now remember the name this bishop, it was so long ago; b
the story I well remember as an ill professors and some ministers fall, su illustrations of this mistake. Chri let no man think to gain a really Chri

Our Young Folks.

Shan't and Won't.

Shant and Wont were two little brothers,
  Angry and sullen and gruff;
Try and Will were dear little sisters,
  One scarcely can love them enough.

Shant and Wont looked down on their noses,
  Their faces were dismal to see;
Try and Will were brighter than roses
  In June, and blithe as the bee.

Shant and Wont were backward and stupid,
  Little indeed did they know:
Try and Will learn something new daily,
  And seldome are headless or slow.

Shant and Wont love nothing, no, nothing,
  So much as to have their own way;
Try and Will give up to their elders,
  And try to please others at play.

Shant and Wont came to terrible trouble,
  Their story is to sad to tell;
Try and Will are now at the infant school,
  Trying to read and spell.

Becoming Christians.

Several little girls were in my study, seeking counsel to aid them in becoming Christians. One of them, a dear child not more than eleven years old, said:

"I haven't been to two or three of the meetings lately."

Desiring to test her, I answered,

"It don't make us Christians to attend meetings, Lizzie."

"I know that," she replied at once, but it keeps it in mind."

The Right Key.

Children often find it hard to learn a plain lesson. Katie came with pouting lips to her father, and showed a little anger. "Pa, I can't open my trunk."

"Have you the right key, my dear child?"

"I do not know. Sister yesterday was using my keys as a bell in playing tea, and I could not find my bunch so I borrowed mother's. But not one of the dozen will open it. I wish I had no trunk."

The father gently told her that "temper made a knot harder to unloose."

"Hand me the keys." He tried one after another. But the right key was not there. "I must call in the locksmith." While her father was gone Katie was fretting over the delay caused by the loss of her keys. By and by the smith came with a wire hoop trung with more than a hundred keys.

"Pa, do tell me, what right have bureau and trunk-makers to invent so many kinds of locks."

"Because the world is a wicked one, and there are many thieves who steal because too lazy to work."

After trying a number, at length the locksmith placed a key in the lock, and in a moment the bolt sprung and the lid arose.

"Now, my child, see how easy it is to open the lock when you have the 'right key.'"

Thus, I thought, we learn why so many prayers children offer are never answered. They go and ask for a new heart, and, like Katie, amid the petty trials of life, they are fretted at this wrong, and checked by that, and get angry whenever they can't do what they want. But I hear some little girl say, 'I should like to know how Katie could keep from being vexed? When I could not get my new shoes on, I got so angry that I flung one way across the room."

If Jenny ever reads this little piece she will find out why her prayers are not heard. No one can indulge her passions day by day, and then kneel down and pray aright. There is in that heart the wrong feeling. You must pray God to change that heart before he will hear. "My son, give me thy heart."

That locksmith might have had a thousand keys, and unless the right one was among them he could not open the trunk. "But why not break it open?" some hasty girl cries. Because it would cost ten times as much to mend it as to pay for the right key.

Remember, in coming to ask gifts of your dear parents you do not, must not, come scolding. He will not give a coral set to any pouting, peevish daughter. A smile, a kiss, a warm embrace, will often win what you want. This is the right key.

Thus you can't force God to give you any blessing. His treasure is full of jewels—brighter, more dazzling a thousand times than the crown jewels of Victoria. The only key that will open those gifts is a child-like faith resting on a loving Saviour. This is the right key.—Presbyterian.

Talk with the Children.

Well, my young folks these evenings are growing long, and will soon afford us more time for social chats; so lay aside the playthings and books, and cares also, draw your chairs up closer together; there, now we can be more social. It is true we may never have met before, but that need not mar our enjoyments, not in the least.

Well, what shall we say—what do you want to hear? You all have something uppermost in your clear, bright minds, but what do you want us to say? Some of you were singing that pretty little song, "Something for all to do," and the good book tells us to sing with understanding. Do you know what you can do? But very little; well, that is a reasonable answer for a girl of your years, but all can do something if they only think so, and though ever so small it sometimes amounts to a great deal.

A company of men were pushing a boat into the water, but with all their strength it would not move. "Another pound and it will go!" cried one of the men. A little boy standing near said he would push a pound, and upon the addition of his strength the boat moved and was soon floating upon the water.—But all these strong men could not of themselves have moved the boat.

Of course you must not expect always to benefit yourselves by what you do; that would be selfishness, and I know there is not one of you who would like to be called selfish. You can lend a hand whenever you see it will do good; can give an encouraging word to the little folks whom you meet; yes, only a few days ago some of you saw the poor crippled boy, he has a very hard time to get along, and is often very much discouraged, for he can only be a looker-on of all the games and amusements which the rest of you enjoy so much, and you who have never suffered as he has cannot believe how thankful he feels for any little kindness shown him by his fellows.

And, little boys and girls,—and big ones also,—when your mother is weary and care worn you can do much to make her sufferings lighter and her heavy eyes brighter by your cheerful obedience and little kindnesses that give quiet joy to a mothers heart. Not only do nothing that would hurt her feelings, but try very hard to do all you possibly can to lighten her cares and increase her happiness.

And boys, many of you will soon find plenty to do; for by the time your mind is filled with good and useful knowledge you will be called to take your stations in busy life,—the banker will want a clerk who never makes an error in his calculations; the merchant will want a salesman who will give satisfaction to his employer and customers; the master machinist will want a boy whom he can instruct and who can take his responsible place among his fellow-workmen in after years.

So with all the occupations of life: besides doing all you can now to help and benefit those among you, there is a great deal to do to get yourselves ready to be useful men and women.

But our talk is growing long, especially for the first one, and should we meet again we will be better acquainted, and you will not feel so distant, and you think over what you would like us to talk about next time. We shall expect you to have something to say bye and bye—we don't want to do all the talking when there are so many bright faces around us. Perhaps next time we will tell you something of some of the good men we read of in the bible. Until then, that you may be well behaved, obedient boys and girls is the hope of your

Obituary.

WILKINS.—Died at his residence, in East Gilead, Mich., Aug 17, 1873, of consumption, Br. Benjamin S. Wilkins Aged, 59 years.

Br. W. was one of the pillars of the church at this place, and one whose name was above reproach. He sleeps, but his influence will live on to bless the church. He leaves a wife, a son, and four daughters to mourn their loss. Funeral services by the writer.

J. R. PRESTON.

FAY.—Fell asleep, June 26, 1873, in Squaw Grove, Ill., Br. Boswell Fay. Aged 78 years.

Being repulsed by the popular theory of retribution, Br. Fay for many years held to the doctrine of universal salvation; but when he heard the truth relative to a future life as it is in Jesus presented, he gladly received it, and died 'in the faith.' C. W SMITH.

SQUIRES.—Fell asleep in Jesus, at Massena, N. Y., Aug. 25, 1873, Lucinda L. Squires, wife of Lovin M. Squires. Aged fifty-three years, ten months, and seven days.

Sr Squires embraced the faith of the personal coming of Christ in 1843, and since has found that the Bible teaches 'the dead know not anything' (Ecc. 9: 5); and that man dies, and 'in that very day his thoughts perish' (Ps. 146. 4); and that the wicked will be in a little while 'as though they had not been,' and even their place, it shall not be (Ps. 37: 10); and that the hour is coming when all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and come forth (Dan. 12: 2, John 5: 28, 29); and that the meek shall inherit the earth (Mat. 5: 5); which were some of her points of faith. She believed, and therefore spoke plainly, and was never ashamed of her hope, but was ready to give a reason of it to any who asked. Though seven miles from her place of worship, with cares often pressing upon her, yet she was usually in her seat Sabbath days, waiting to catch a word of instruction or admonition.

Though sick but nine days, yet her suffering was intense; during which time we could hear her say, 'Bless Jesus, glory be to Jesus, praise Jesus,' which showed there was victory in death, and that such faith will triumph in the dying hour. A kind husband, three children, and a large number of friends and relatives, are left to mourn. May they all prepare to meet her in peace. With a few remarks, we tried to comfort the mourning and warn the careless.

Book Notices, Etc.

DR. BLAUVELT'S articles on Modern Skepticism, in SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY, have excited more discussion than any similar articles which have appeared for a long time. The third and concluding paper, entitled Modern Skepticism—What our Laymen must do about it, appears in the October number. The same number has the concluding pages of Dr. Holland's Arthur Bonnicastle, and of Bret Harte's Episode of Fiddletown. Lulu Gray Noble prints a trenchant essay on Free Marriage. George W. Cable gives us a very bright and characteristic little New Orleans story, and Albert Rhodes describes A Day in the French Assembly. There is a pleasant paper on Paying Debts; a valuable sketch of Dr. Francis Lieber; a curious collection of Turkish Proverbs; an interesting illustrated article on The Geysers of California, by Benjamin P. Avery; another pictorial paper on The New York Central Park, and a description, with pictures, of The Old Van Rensselaer Mansion. The poetry is by Geo. Macdonald, Edward King, D. N, Beach, J. V. C., and Caroline R. Wilkinson.

Dr. Holland, in Topics of the Time, discusses Gentlemen in Politics, Moderate Prices, and A New Woman's College. In the Old Cabinet are The Staggy Person A Friend with a Single Fault, and Morning, Noon and Night, and the other regular departments are interesting.

With the November number a new volume will commence. Miss Tafton will give the grand serial of the year, and it is said it will be striking and beautiful. Mr. Froude's papers will also begin in November. All

Poetry.

Evening by Evening.

Good night, ye gems of beauty,
  Good night, thou gentle blue;
On quiet bed I lay me,
  And bid farewell to you
Good night, ye wakeful woodlands,
  Good night, ye sleeping flowers,
And I whose smiles and odors
  I've passed day's wayward hours.
Good night, ye star lipt mountains,
  Old friends, the tried and true;
Good night, ye wandering waters;
  Ocean, good night to you.
    Good night to all, but not to Thee,
    My God, who ever art with me

Good night, dear faces round me,
  Night's hours will swiftly run;
And we shall say, Good morning,
  At the ascending sun
The farewell hour is coming,
  The last good night is near,
When I shall part in silence
  From those who love me here.
Then, all my farewells over,
  Just passing out of sight,
Unweeping and untrembling,
  I'll look my last good night.
    Good night to all, but not to Thee,
    My God, who ever art with me.

Yet not good night forever;
  For He who is my day
Will wake me soon;—I see Him,
  Already on His way.
No, not good night for ever;
  I shall but sleep in Him,
Who shall arouse me early,
  While yet the dawn is dim,—
Who shall arouse me early,
  And bid this flesh arise,
In glorious resurrection,
  To meet Him in the skies.
    Good night to all, but not to Thee,
    My God, who ever art with me.

I see Him, lo, He cometh!
  Himself the morning light,
To bring the dawn of gladness,
  The dawn that knows no night.
O Bridegroom of the morning!
  Bright bringer of the day,
Put on thy fair adorning,
  Thy beautiful array.
Lord Jesus, star of evening,
  Yet star of morning too:
Earth's uncreated splendor,
  Rise on our longing view.
    Good night to all, but not to Thee,
    My God, who ever art with me.

—Dr. H Bonar.

The Second Advent.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH CROSS, D. D.

"And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." (Luke 21. 27.)

The government of God is an economy of compensation and retribution. Our present human condition is full of disorders and inequalities. There must come a period of adjustment. Wisdom and goodness must ultimately triumph. Depressed and suffering virtue must be rewarded; and vice, too often successful and prosperous, must be appropriately punished. This doctrine, so accordant with reason, is plainly taught by Revelation. It pervades the whole volume of Holy Scripture. We meet with it in many forms—in narrative, argument, prophecy, simile and parable, explicit statement and incidental allusion, the simplest records of prose and the sublimest strains of poetry. But where is to be the scene of adjustment? In this or some other world? Surely, the remedy should be applied where the evil prevails. Here, if anywhere, shall be enacted the judgment of the living and the dead. Here if anywhere, shall be realized the retribution of nature and of man. The vague imagination, that the inhabitants of the earth are to be transferred to some other sphere, and there dealt with according to their deeds, is neither rational nor Scriptural.

A wise and powerful monarch has a distant province in rebellion, wasted with anarchy, ravaged by cruelity, and wretched through rampant crime. What will he do? He is just, but he is also kind and forbearing. He looks with mingled indignation and sorrow upon the insurgents. What will he do? Will he commission an overwhelming force to transport the whole population, obedient and rebellious, to the mother country for judicial proceedings, and then lay waste the territory and leave it a perpetual desolation? Nay, he will correct and reclaim, he will subdue and deliver. He will not crush by violence, but he will restore by righteousness. He will not give up the territory to oblivion, and erase a title from his royal brow; but he will chastise the insurgents with discretion, recover as many as he can to their allegiance, rescue the injured and the oppressed, and destroy the incorrigible. Instead of depopulating the land and laying its dwellings in ashes, he will prefer the nobler trophies of anarchy crushed, and enmity subdued, and fertility restored, and a redeemed province teeming with a loyal and virtuous population. Does not wisdom approve the preference?

And what teach the Revelations of God? Is this globe to be unpeopled and annihilated? Is it to be made a monument of the Divine wrath, and preserve no memoral of the Divine mercy? Is the noble barque to be wrecked, and left stranded on an accursed shore forever? Calcined by the last fire, is this fair earth, visited so often by angels and marked with the footsteps of the Son of God, to rush wildly from its orbit, an outcast from the family of planets,

The burning wreck of a demolished world,
A wandering hell in the eternal space?

Are the saints to be removed from the scene of their redemption? Is the original patrimony and sovereignty of man to be wrested from him forever? Is the grant made to Adam, renewed to the patriatchs, repeated by all the prophets, and finally confirmed by "the Lord from Heaven," never to be made good? How is Christ the "Second Adam," if he redeem not the forfeiture of the first? Why are we taught to pray that our Father's kingdom may come, and his will be done on earth as in Heaven? Do these promises and petitions contemplate a translation to some happier sphere, or the rescue and renovation of this? Where is the Kingdom of God to come? Where is his will to be done as in Heaven? In the sun, the moon, or the stars? In Mars, Venus, or Jupiter? Verily, we can offer no sublimer prayer, and none more consonant with the design of the Redeemer's advent, than this—that the hallowed sceptre of the earth, usurped by the prince of darkness, and wielded by him so long and so cruelly over the fallen lord of this lower world, may be restored to human hands, even the hands of the Mighty Antitype, the Second Adam, the Lord from Heaven. Oh, no! Satan shall not wear his stolen diadem forever, His despotic sway shall be broken. His dominion shall be taken away.

"The prince of this world is judged; now shall he be cast out." Expelled already from Heaven, he shall soon be ejected from the earth. This planet belongs to Christ, and he shall come to claim it for himself. "And thou, profane, wicked prince, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, take off the crown, and remove the diadem; abase him that is high, and exalt him that is low; I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more, till he shall come whose right it is, and I will give it him." This proclamation which God the Father hath sent before the chariot of his Royal Son, is hastening to its accomplishment. The second advent shall crown the first with glory. Then shall the whole earth be at rest, and man redeemed shall inherit the promised dominion. Rescued from the tyranny of Satan, to share Immanuel's glory, in actual sovereignty and perfect blessedness, the saints "shall reign on the earth."

"Thus heavenward all things tend, for all were once
Perfect, and all shall be at length restored.
So God hath greatly purposed. Who would else
In His dishonored works Himself endure
Dishonor, and be wronged without redress."

The contrary doctrine belies the whole scheme of Divine Revelation. If this world is not to be ransomed and renewed, but depopulated and destroyed—if Christ is to come simply as a mighty judge, to hold a grand assize, separate the righteous from the wicked, remove the former to a happier scene of being, banish the latter to an appropriate place of torment, and then annihilate this globe, or render it unhabitable, and leave it forever under the ban of his vengeance, as if it were a guilty thing, and deserving such sanctity of doom—then where is the fulfillment of prophecy? then where is the redemption of the pledge? But the inspired charter of our hopes furnishes us better instructions, and warrants us in cherishing better expectations. "Christ was once offered to bear the sin of many; and to them that look for him he shall appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation." His humanity links him indissolubly with this earth; and he shall come to triumph where he suffered, and reign where he redeemed. For this fulfillment of her Master's promise, the Church has been looking with joyful confidence ever since he ascended from Olivet, and a glance at the accompaniments of this glorious parousia will justify her longing expectation.

The final object and issue of Immanuel's glorious advent will be the establishment on earth of his imperishable kingdom of righteousness and peace, in which all his faithful followers are to participate as joint heirs of his inheritance and royal ministers of his throne. They say, indeed, that the Messianic kingdom is already established at his former coming, being spiritual and ecclesiastical in its character; and that it is destined to go on from age to age, extending its limits and increasing in power, till it embraces all nations and fills the whole earth. I admit that the church is the kingdom of Christ, but it is only in embryo or chrysalis, hereafter to be developed in the perfection of its beauty. I acknowledge that the power of grace in the regenerate heart is the kingdom of Christ, but it is only as the swelling bud, which in the prophetical springtide of the universe shall burst into fragrant blossom, and in the eternal summer of our restored and perfected nature shall form the ripened fruit. Our Lord tells us, that "when the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." To sit upon the throne of his glory—what is it but to exercise his glorious regal prerogatives? and this he does not do till his glorious manifestation, with his angelic retinue. With this agrees the declaration of the apostle Paul, "the Lord Jesus shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom;" where "his appearing and his kingdom" are mentioned as synchronous events, and with them the judgement of "the quick and the dead." This is the kingdom whose coming we invoke in the Lord's Prayer, the subject of a thousand promises throughout the Holy Scriptures, the consummation of all the hopes of the faithful, and the crown of all their joys. Courage, ye fearful saints! Your Master will return as he departed, and enthrone you with himself in a renovated world. The night may be dark and stormy, but it is "far spent," and the Everlasting Light will soon dawn upon us. "Then shall the moon be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Jerusalem, and in Mount Zion, and before his ancients gloriously."

Power of Faith.

It cannot be. God must change before he will let a sinner perish who trusts in Christ.

Oh, it is wonderful what power faith has. I recollect standing at the Mansion House one day, waiting to cross over to the other side where the omnibusses were coming from all the corners of the compass, and I was looking for an opportunity to run in and out between them. A blind man came up and said; I am sure you will lead me across, I am sure you will lead me across." I am sure I did not want the job; but I am quite sure that, if the blind man was sure I would do it, I could not decline to do it; and I did it accordingly. I did not like to have a blind man's confidence thrown away. It seemed as if his confidence was my compulsion. And, oh, blind sinner, lay hold upon the skirts of Christ to-night, and say, "Jesus, I believe that thou wilt lead me. At any rate, I mean to trust thee to do it. I have done with saving myself, and I mean to rely on thee and thee only." I tell you, your faith will compel him; your faith will hold him fast. He will do anything for faith. Was he not overcome at the brook Jabbok by Jacob's faith? Did not faith in the woman that touched the hem of his garment win a cure? And when he spoke to the Syro-Phœnician woman, and called her a dog, did she not win healing for her daughter by the brave stand she made by her faith? The Lord waiteth to be garcious! Trust him, sinner. The Lord help you to do so; and he shall have the glory, for ever and ever!—Spurgeon.

Still, let God's people thank him, and take courage. Though grace is slow in its progress, it shall change the whole man betimes; and the motto which flashes in gold on the high-priest's forehead shall be engraven on our reason, heart, and fancy; on our thoughts, desires and affections; on our lips, and hands, and feet; on our wealth, and power, and time; on our body, and soul, and spirit—the whole man shall be "holiness to the Lord."

"By their Fruits."

The words of Christ are all and always for use. That we are to look at people in their profession and reality, is taught by these words. The Savior only assumed a fact which would have existed if he had said nothing of it. Men have used their eyes ever since the world began, and ever will. Fruit-bearing is the Christly standard of discipleship. We, as well as others, are looked upon, and the look has reflex influence, and people are made better by the sight, if we are what we ought to be. It is easy to realize that others are being looked at, but we are subject to the same scrutiny.

It ought to be a pleasure to shine for Jesus as lights in the world. It would be if pride were so much removed from us that our conscious honesty would make the look of others pleasure able, simply that Christ might be honored and souls blest. Fruit comes out of nature. As I look out of my window, I see two trees beside each other, of similar shape and of the same size. But in putting on their spring clothing, one looks red, and the other yellow; not the air, nor the soil, but the nature of the tree decides the color, and will determine the fruit. How easily should we show Christly fruit when we are filled with its nature! Then as the leaves of healing will be the spirit and words which go from us to others from day to day.—Sel.

Hints to Writers.

It is a great thing to have some little work always going forward. Only by experience will you really understand how a very little thing done faithfully every day will, in the process of days, mount up to a great sum. If you are a human being that can write (to write is the great consolation of some), then write even one page a day. The hours pass; the pages accumulate; they grow into something very considerable. And what is written is written. It abides; you have something to show for your work. It is a vexing thing in the work of many men, that a great deal of it just does the thing needful for the day, and leaves no permanent trace. Even to get a matter into your memory, is an intangible possession; still more is it an immaterial and imponderable acquisition to have trained yourself to a moral habit. But pleasant and substantial are the covered pages; that is, if you know you have done them to the very best of your ability. Though not a soul on earth may think them good; though even you keenly see their faults; there is a true and sweet satisfaction in that last thought.

There is nothing on earth so beautiful as the smile on the face of duty. Something faithfully done is somehow inexpressibly cheering. And then, work takes the mind off itself. The mill must go; give it grist to grind, or it must grind itself. One good thing about a task of writing is, that while lying awake at night, instead of thinking over a hundred worrying and anxious thoughts, you will involuntarily be ruminating your subject, and trying to see your way further through it. When Chalmers rose in the morning, he had often done all his task of writing for that day; and noted it in a few short-hand lines in pencil.—Country Parson.

Armageddon.

S. K. GIBSON.

The word itself signifies "mountain of destruction" or of slaughter. It seems to be used in the Apocalypse as a symbol of the battle of the great day of God Almighty, and no doubt is taken from the word Megiddo, or Mageddon, which was once the scene of great slaughter and carnage. Says Dr. Wm. Smith in his Bible Dictionary, "Megiddo was in a very marked position on the southern rim of the plain of Esdraelon, on the frontier line of the territories of the tribes of Issachar and Manassah, and commanding one of those passes from the north into the hill country, which were of such critical importance on various occasions in the history of Judaea. The first mention occurs in Josh. 12: 21 where Megiddo appears as a city of one of those kings whom Joshua defeated on the west of Jordan.

The song of Deborah brings the place vividly before us as the scene of the great conflict between Sisera and Barak. The chariots of Sisera were gathered unto the river of Kishon. (Judg. 4: 13.) Barak went down with his men from Mount Tabor into the plain (4: 14), then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo. (5: 19.) The chief historical interest of Megiddo is concentrated in Josiah's death, when Pharaph-nechoo came from Egypt against the king of Assyria, Josiah joined the latter and was slain at Megiddo,(2 Kings 23: 29), and his body was carried form thence to Jerusalem.

The story is told in the Chronicles in more detail. (2 Chron. 35: 22, 24.) There the fatal action is said to have taken place in the valley of Megiddon.

This calamity made a deep and permanent impression on the Jews. Thus in the language of the prophets (Zech. 12: 11), the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo? become a prophetical expression for the deepest and most despairing grief; as in the Apocalypse (Rev. 16: 16), Armageddon in continuance of the same imagery, is presented in the scene of terrible and final conflict. Megiddo is the modern el-Lejjun, which is undoubtedly the Legio of Eusebius and Jerome."

I do not regard it as strange that Mr. Smith and others should look for the literal accomplishment of much of the imagery of the Old Testament when brought into the New, and made prominent in the scene of the coming judgment. Concerning the Babylon; are not the types, symbols and tropes of the old handed down to the new testament, to be fulfilled literally? How can we doubt when we trace them through from the beginning to the ending, when "Babylon shall be brought in rememberance before God?"

So again with "Tophet, or the valley of the son of Hinnom," when the worm shall not die, neither shall the fire be quenched." Christ takes up, this imagery or figure, and points us forward to the future Gehenna of fire where soul and body will be destroyed, of those who obey not the gospel; and is the same as the second death in Revelations, which is the final ending of Tophet.

Meigiddo was the scene of conflict and carnage. Armageddon is to be the final scene of conflict in the great day of God Almighty. The spirits of demons inspired wicked men to deeds of carnage and blood in olden times; so in the latter times "the spirits of devils working miracles (will)go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world to gather them to the battle of the great day of God Almighty." (Rev. 16: 14.) And he gathered them into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon." (v. 16). The "gathering" here cannot be the gathering of the saints, for (1,) the saints are gathered out of every nation, kindred, tongue, and people; while these are the kings of the whole world.

And (2,) the saints are caught up to the Lord in the air when he comes: whereas this gathering is after the Lord comes. And (3,) the saints are gathered to Jerusalem as saints: "The Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." (Is. 24: 23.) See Jer. 33 and Zech. 14. It is not in Armageddon, then, that the Lord will reign with his saints, but in Jerusalem, a city of peace, and not of war, blood and carnage. And (4,) these are led, not by the spirit of God, but by the spirit of devils, and come under the vials of God's wrath. The seven vials, are the last temporal judgments upon a wicked world; the saints are not partakers of these plagues; they fall alone upon the wicked who "worship the beast and his image," and the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God," while the saints stand upon the sea of glass, and sing the song of victory, not in Armageddon but in Jerusalem, the "city of the great King." The earth is yet to be the scene of mighty and terrible conflict; but one in which God's people will not suffer, it will belong alone to the wicked.

The book of Revelations is not the only one that teaches that there will be a battle among the nations of earth, that will be the final one. Jeremiah says the wine cup of the Lord's fury shall be put to the lips of every natio'n, and says "ye shall certainly drink:" "Drink ye, and be drunken and spew and fall, and rise no more, because of the sword which I shall send among you." The Lord shall roar from on high and utter his voice from his holy habitation; he shall give a shout, as they that tread the grapes, against all the inhabitants of the earth: a noise shall come even to the ends of the earth; for the Lord hath a controversy with the nations; he will plead with all flesh: he will give them that are wicked to the sword, saith the Lord. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Behold evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth. And the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth: they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried: they shall be dung upon the ground." (Jer. 25.) Isaiah, also, gives us a vivid and glowing description of the impending judgments of earth's inhabitants: "The Lord shall punish the host of the high ones that are on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth. And they shall be gathered together as prisoners are gathered in the pit and shall be shut up in the prison, and after many days shall they be visited. Then the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion and in Jerusalem and before his ancients gloriously." I believe these scriptures teach us that this dispensation will close by the temporal judgment of God upon the wicked, in which they will die the first, or Adamic death; from which they will arise and come to judgment, where they will die the second death in Gehenna fire; as they must of necessity die the first death before they can die the second. And the prophet says: "They shall be gathered together as prisoners are gathered in the pit and shall be shut up in the prison, and after many days shall they be visited." Does it not mean they shall die and after many days be resurrected? If not, does it teach that the Lord will gather the wicked and shut them up in a pit alive, many days, then visit them? If so, there may be a probation after the Lord comes.

No, the judgments of God will destroy the wicked under the vials of his wrath, "and the nations shall rush like the rushing of mighty waters, but God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee far off and shall be chased as the chaff of the mountain before the wind, and like a thistle before the whirlwind." See Joel. 3: 9-17; also, when in the harvest of earth; war among the nations shall be proclaimed, and the mighty men of war are to be waked up, preparation made, plowshares beat into, words and pruning hooks into spears, the heathen awakened, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, which is the valley of "decision" or "concission vs. threshing." (Margin.) So too, the Revelator says: "The nations are angry, thy wrath is come and the time of the dead that they should be judged." (Rev. 11.) See also ch. 19, when in the final conflict of nations, and the slain of the Lord are many, God will invite the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven to come and eat the flesh of kings and of captains and of mighty men, which "are not lamented or buried." This is the supper of the great God. With these scriptures before us, (and there are many more that teach the same things,) how can we fail to believe in the coming battle of the great God? and which in the figures of prophecy, is called, Armageddon? It is very evident to my mind, that in Rev. 16, vs. 14 and 16 stand connected, as to instruction: and v. 15 is thrown in by way of admonition. For in v. 15 Christ speaks, and says "I," the pronoun is in the first person. In the 16 v. John tells what he saw, and he uses the pronoun "he" third person; which shows that the 16 v. is a continuation of the same subject from v. 14; and that would make but one gathering, all of one class, seduced by the spirits of devils which go forth to the kings of the earth and the whole world to gather them to the battle of the great day of God Almight, and they are gathered in a place called Armageddon. Amen. While, as we understand, God "gathers" or causes the gathering to take place, it is not God directly, but indirectly, he uses means. He says, "I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling," unto all people round about." "The Lord maketh the earth empty." The earth is defiled unto the inhabitation thereof: because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth." (Is 24.) Again, "I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle." "I will send the sword among you." It is thus the Lord makes the wrath of man praise him. He has even used one wicked nation to punish another; and now in the last controversy with the nations, he permits the spirits of devils to go forth and do the work of gathering; they take possession of men and lead them on to final conflict. The Lord help us to be found watching and waiting for Christ, for only such will escape the deceptions of the seducing spirits, "which if possible will deceive the very elect." And here we are amid these "perils" and "preperations" for the great and decisive day of the Lord; "and who may abide the day of his coming."

The Church.---No. 4.

C. C. MARSTON.

The Scriptures describe very clearly the kind of person required to discharge the duties of an elder. It is not every man, who is fit for the place. One may be an exemplary christian, and able to do much good in a humble sphere, and yet not qualified for the eldership of a church. Great mistakes have been made in this matter. The idea prevails with many that if a man is "good" he is prepared for any calling of God. This is a mistake. True, without "goodness" we are unfit for the work of the Lord. But every "good man" cannot preach the gospel; neither is every good man fit to be elder in a church. We read "God gave some apostles" etc. (Eph. 4: [illegible].) Again Paul addresses the elders of the church at Ephesus as having been made so by the Holy Spirit. (Acts 20: 28.) No man has any right to assume this office; indeed it is a fearful thing to aspire to it unlawfully. Unless a person is specially fitted for it by the Holy Spirit, and possesses qualifications such as God's book specifies he has no right to its work. And if he should by craft secure the endorsement of a church as its elder he will soon prove a failure and a disgrace and the cause will languish under his administration. Still, however, there is such a thing as scripturally aspiring to this work. "If any one longs after an overseer's office, he desires an excellent work." (Em. Dis. 1 Tim. 3: 1.) All who possess the qualification for the work will desire it, and even "long after" it. To such Paul would say they "desire an excellent work." Now let us glance at the gospel signs of fitness for this office. 1 Tim. 3: 1, 7; Titus 1: 6-11. An elder or bishop must be blameless, or "irreproachable" as the Diaglott reads. Any one against whom a charge can be preferred is not fit for this office. He must be without a reproach. He must be moral, upright, honest, chaste, truthful. It may be asked, are not these things required of all who belong to the church, as well as of its officers? To which I reply that the church in some instances is a sort of spiritual hospital, where the spiritual sick and dying are nurtured and cared for. Luke 14: 21, answers this description. There "the poor, maimed, halt, and blind" were bidden to the feast. But the keeper of a hospital should not himself be an invalid. So, though the church may have the sick and maimed ones in its membership, yet its overseer or elder should be sound and well—blameless.

The elder must not be a polygamist—he must be the husband of one wife. In the days of the apostles, as now, there were those who believed in the plurality of wives. It is supposed by many that when a polygamist was converted to Christianity he was not required immediately and unceremoniously to break up his family relations and turn away his wives and children as would be the case many times destitute and helpless. Yet the gospel is radically opposed to polygamy, and one of its designs was to restore the family relations to its original purity and sanctity. Hence the propriety and necessity of having the leaders and teachers in the church practically as well as theoretically opposed to this error. Thus the custom would become dishonerable, and in time die out entirely, which was the case.

"Vigilance" is another characteristic. He must be watchful—always on the alert. He is to have a care for the welfare and safety of his flock. Satan is always busy. And there is no end to the varieties of his schemes to ruin the church of God. The elder is a sort of Spiritual watchman on the walls of Zion whose duty it is to give the alarm on the approach of any outside foe or evil. Then there are internal convulsions and troubles constantly rising requiring the attention of the most careful vigilance. Careless and sloth in the overseer has in more than one instance proved the ruin of the church.

He must be "sober." This does not refer to temperance, but rather to the quiet and calmness of a well balanced mind. There are persons who lose all control of their minds and passions when surrounded with circumstances calculated to disturb and perplex them. Such an one is not fit to be elder in the church of God. It is expected that he will pass through just such scenes, and for the safety and good of the flock he must be sober and be able to control himself fully while the storm may rage fearfully without.

The elder that "rules well" must be of "modest or good behavior." There is danger of men in "high positions" being "puffed up." This is true in both church and state. Some men cannot endure promotion. To be a good elder, the office as to honor, must be entirely forgotten. And the work with reference only to the glory of the Master must be the absorbing thought "Given to hospitality." This is one of the Christian graces; and yet it is spoken of specially as a qualification for the eldership. No penurious, inhospitable man is fit to have the spiritual oversight of a church. "Like priest, like people" is a well known maxim. The elders are to be examples to the rest of the flock. If they are naturally inhospitable the spirit of it will crop out in their teaching and example, and soon the whole society will partake of the same narrow contracted selfishness. And vise versa. A watchful man of a church who is hospitable and open-hearted will have his influence in the same direction.

"Apt to teach." There are two kinds of teachers in the church: Mechanical teachers, and easy or natural teachers. Some men teach as though, seemingly, they could not help it. They are apt to teach. Others what little they are capable of teaching seems to be from a faculty that is manufactured and mechanical. They are not easy or natural teachers. This is an important part of the elder's office. There is a difference between teaching and preaching. While all preachers are teachers to a certain degree, yet all teachers are not preachers. Preaching is the more public proclamation of the gospel to the world. Teaching relates to the more private instructions of the church, illustrating and explaining that proclamation after it has been given. "Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth, on teaching." (Rom. 12: 7.) "He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers." (Eph. 4: 11.) Here the distinction is made plain. One waits on his ministry or the preaching of the word, while the other, who is a teacher by calling, waits on teaching. The "pastor," or shepherd of the flock, is also the teacher or instructor of the same. This work is local, while that of preaching or proclaiming is general. This is a wise provision. After the word has been preached and a society been raised up there is need of some one to expound the scriptures and instruct those young converts in the way to life. Who shall do it? The preacher has probably gone to another community, which was the apostolic way of laboring. So he cannot perform this work of teaching. It falls upon those who are teachers in the church—those who are "apt to teach"—the elders.

The Image Beast and Worship.

P. ALLING.

In the 6th chapter of Ephesians we have an exhortation "to put on the whole armor of God," and to take for our weapon of warfare "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." And why? Because, we "war not against flesh and blood, but against principalities; against powers; against the rulers of the darkness of this world; against spiritual wickedness in high places." (Margin, wicked spirits in heavenly places.) This has been the character of the powers and principalities of earth in all ages of the past; and will be pre-eminently so in their last forms, as clearly revealed in the book of Revelation, and particularly so in the symbols of chapter 13 and 17. That we may understand our true relation to these powers, and the dangers to which we may be exposed, I will give a quotation from chapters 14 and 15, defining the results upon the two classes in the final day: "And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which shall be poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation." "And I saw, as it were, a sea of glass mingled with fire, and those that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and ver his mark, and over the number of is name, stand on the sea of glass, aving the harps of God; and they ng the song of Moses, the servant of iod, and the song of the Lamb." The ontext shows the universality of these wo classes. There are but the two: hose who "worship," and those "who vercome." These are considerations aat should move every thinking mind › an examination of the subject, with n intensity that will take no denial ll the matter is understood, and we dividually learn in which class we re now standing.

In Rev. 13, 14, 15, we have this language: "And he [the two horned east] deceiveth them that dwell on he earth by means of those miracles e had power to do in the sight of the east; saying to them that dwell on ne earth that they should make an nage to the beast, which had a wound y a sword and did live." "And he ad power to give life to the image of he beast; that the image of the beast hould both speak and cause that as nany as would not worship the image f the beast should be killed." I wish hese points to be noted and kept in nind by the reader, viz:

1. That the dwellers upon earth are eceived by the miracles wrought by he two-horned beast.

2. That the beast in whose sight hese miracles are wrought is the papal estored beast.

3. This is a likeness, or a power resembling that papal beast, "which had wound by a sword and did live" after ts restoration.

4. That there are three distinct, eparate, living beasts here brought to iew, all existing at the same time, nd that time is this side of the ending f the 1260 years, as previously shown.

The image will now claim our attenon. The wars of the French revoition, and the early wars of Napoleon, vere directed especially against both he civil and ecclesiastical powers of he papacy, and ended in their overhrow and destruction, as anciently rganized. This fall left the Protestant ations of Europe and the world in the scendancy. It is true, Protestantism as divided up into various phases, till it was the prevailing, permanent eligion of Europe. It stood back of he civil power of the nations, but exrcised a moulding influence that dicated many of the acts of the Vienna reaty of 1814; and especially their ubsequent act in the creation of what s called the holy alliance treaty. In his last treaty the rulers "pledged hemselves to govern according to the recepts of the Christian religion, and o receive into that alliance all others rulers], who professed the same princiles which dictated that act." All of he sovereigns of Europe signed that ompact, except the Pope. Thus we ee that protestantism was then a power uperior to the papacy, as previously hown, by their acts of restoration of he papacy to the civil and ecclesiastial power she held from that time to er downfall in 1870. In the acts of he Vienna treaty, and subsequent acts, Protestantism was recognized as an ggregate; whilst each nation was free o choose their own phases and forms f religion, and to make laws for its rotection and advancement. In each f those nations at that time, and since, here has been a national religion with he ruling sovereign, as its legal head, nd power is lodged in that head to nforce the acts of those organisms, qually as great, or even greater, than hat exercised by the Pope in the papal States of Italy since that epoch.

Again, in chapter 17, the papacy is called "Great Babylon, the mother of harlots." Now, as those Protestants were all once members of the mother church, and came out from her as proestors against some of her most lagrant errors and abominations, may he not be correct in calling them "apostate daughters?" This application includes the entire family of individualized daughters, as they are now and heretofore have existed; whilst the image beast of chapter 13 represents the same class, aggregated nationally as they were in the acts of the Vienna and holy alliance treaties, and as now seen in their world's alliance meetings.

Up to the close of the last century the papal religion had the ascendency over the nations of earth. Since that time it has been reversed, and Protestantism has had it, world-wide, over the papacy, Mohammedism and heathenism, sustained by these Protestant nations, in all climes, much as was the papal religion by the Pope and the ten kingdoms during the 1260 year period. Revelation and history here agree, and form a cable not easily broken.

These conclusions are confirmed by the various "World's Christian Alliances," convocations held in different part of Europe, within the last twenty-five years, and in the one about to convene in the city of New York. All these meetings, in so many respects, resemble similar assemblies of the papacy in her earlier days, that it requires no great stretch of imagination to see in them a striking likeness, or image, to the papal restored beast. If further testimony is needed, I think it will soon be furnished in the speedy adoption of measures for a Protestant Ecumenical Council, soon to assemble to consummate their world-wide plans. One great object thus to be attained is this, to induce the nations to agree to settle all their difficulties by arbitration, as did the United States and England the late Alabama question. Already they have sent out their agents, who are visiting the courts and crowned heads of Europe and America for this purpose, who report favorably. If this object can be attained it will be hailed as a sure precursor of the world's conversion to the Protestant faith, as their final hope of the world. The enormous expense of the standing armies of Europe is now exhausting their national strength and resources to such a fearful degree as to cause their rulers to listen to the suggestion, as their hope of safety.

The miracles wrought, consist in the wonderful advancement in the arts and sciences; in the introduction of steam as a propelling power; in the building of steamboats, railroads and telegraphs; in the extension of knowledge in every department, and especially in printing and circulating of the Bible in nearly all the languages of earth, by missionary and other societies, aided and protected by the governments as above noted. The deception is this: the dwellers upon earth are lead to believe that through these and other human instrumentalities, under the fostering care and influence of these Christian nations, the long-promised latter day glory of the church is to be ushered in without the personal intervention of Christ. This deception is a great one, and nearly universal in all Protestant nations.

Worship is defined to be adoration. This being the definition, it requires no proof or argument to sustain the allegation that the dwellers upon earth are guilty of this sin. The rivers of blood shed, and the untold amount of treasures expended in every age of the past in defense of their civil and religious institutions of man's devising, attests the fact of this adoration.

Thus are the present powers and principalities of earth, exalted to the heavenly places under the guidance of those wicked spirits, now transformed into angels of light, and must be overcome if we will be victors and sing the song of Moses, the servant of God and the Lamb. Hence, the whole armor is indispensable in this mighty warfare. These things are the filling out of the vision, which was "for the time of the end," and will speedily terminate in their final overthrow in the battle of the great day of God Almighty.

Origin of Souls.

O. D. GIBSON.

The origin of souls, or at what point in the history of the great past, the soul commenced its career, has been to me a point of some interest, provided it is correct that it is a living, conscious entity in the body, and also after the body is in the dust, thus showing it to be distinct from, and independent of the body. Admitting this to be the case, the query is, Does this soul begin with the body, or does its origin date long before this point in its history? Now this question was answered in my hearing a few evenings since by a theological divine who claims to be Greek, and I think also a Hebrew scholar. He doubtless thought to solve this knotty question, and end all further doubts, or controversy on it. He stated that "soul's were not made to order and given at birth, but were all invested in Adam. Not only were the bodies of the whole race in Adam, but also their immortal souls were in him; and are generated, or transmitted by generation, the same as the body." Now I may be hard to be suited, but to say the least, this answer is not altogether satisfactory. It may be a real revelation of how the immortal soul, and the mortal body happen to be found in company, but the soul's origin is still in obscurity, as placing it in Adam and his transmitting it to his children, is not telling its origin, but simply a few of its movements, or a few acts in its history. Neither does it inform us whether it was a conscious entity before it was placed in Adam. Now, inasmuch as they say it is, while in, and continues to be after the body dies, why should it not be before it enters the race in Adam? If then it existed in a separate state before Adam we have the old transmigration theory confirmed. Is it not a little singular that after it migrates from the body, it should remember all the events of its life in the body, when now it is in the body it has no recollections of its former life before it entered it? Now if my intelligent part was in Adam, it must have been an intelligence then; why then can I not recall the events that happend then, as well as since I was born? This doubtless seems singular reasoning, or reasoning about singular things; yet how can one help it? When such singular problems are put forth, one naturally desires to solve them.

But how immortal souls can generate or beget their kind was not elucidated, or explained. If some one who may read this in the "TIMES" can do it, they will confer a favor. Souls, they say, are immaterial,—will they explain the process of that which has no substance, to produce that which has none? also whether it is anything, or nothing when produced?

How to be Happy.

"Some time since," says Dr. Payson, in a letter to a young clergyman, "I took up a little work purporting to be the lives of sundry character as related by themselves. Two of these characters agreed in remarking that they were never happy until they ceased striving to be great men. This remark struck me, as you know the most simple remarks will strike us when heaven pleases. It occurred to me at once that the most of my sufferings and sorrows were occasioned by an unwillingness to be nothing, which I am, and by consequent struggles to be something. I saw if I would but cease struggling, and consent to be anything or nothing, just as God pleases, I might be happy. You will think it strange that I mention this as a new discovery. In one sense it is not new; I had known it for years. But I now saw it in a new light. My heart saw it and consented to it; and I am comparatively happy. My dear brother, if you can give up all desire to be great, and feel heartily willing to be nothing, you will be happy too."

The Christian Life.

Come to the Ark.

Come to the Ark! Come to the Ark!
To Jesus come away.
The pestilence walks forth by night,
The arrow flies by day.

Come to the Ark! the waters rise,
The seas their billows rear;
While darkness gathers o'er the skies,
Behold a refuge near!

Come to the Ark! ere yet the flood
Your wandering steps oppose;
Come! for the door that open stood
IS NOW ABOUT TO CLOSE.

Come to the Ark! all, all that weep
Beneath the sense of sin;
Without, deep calleth unto deep,
But all is peace within.

Perfection.

J. BUFFUM,

Some Christian people, and even some ministers, seem to have an unaccountable aversion to the words "perfect" and "perfection," as found in the Scriptures; and persist in explaining them so as to make them mean imperfection. Nevertheless the commandment remains, "Be ye perfect," and "Be ye holy," (Lev. 20: 7; 1 Pet. 1: 16): and the words seem to be plain enough if we are willing to have them so, especially when compared with other portions of the Holy Writ.

There are three precious statements in the Scriptures which have fastened themselves on my mind, in which the word "perfect" occurs, so as to make it extremely desirable for us all to attain the character and position to which they apply. The first is Isa. 26: 3, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee." The second is James 3: 2, "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." And the third occurs in 1 John 4: 18, "Perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love." It seems to me there can be no servant of Christ but must desire to be in possession of "perfect love," and the more so because it is said in the previous verse, "Herein is our love made perfact, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment." If ever we need boldness and fearlessness, it will certainly be in that great and solemn day.

"Perfect peace," and a mind "stayed" on God; "a perfect man" that "offendeth not in word;" and "perfect love which casteth out fear," how desirable all of them! If we are of those who are "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of Jesus Christ, our great God and Saviour,"* we should pray and strive with all faithfulness and earnestness, cost what it may, to be made acquainted with, and partakers of, these blessings. If we take God at his word, with humble faith relying on the merits of Jesus, we shall find that "the very God of peace will sanctify us wholly, and preserve our whole spirit, and soul, and body, blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—(1 Thess. 5: 26) —Advent Herald.

Patience.

V. HUNT.

Patience is a little word, but when we come to pronounce it by our actions, it is not so little. With out patience we can not please God. We must be patient in well doing; for says Paul, "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise." (Heb. 10: 35, 36.)

So you see that "patince" is of great value, for if we do the will of God, if we have not patience we will loose our reward. Again we are told: "To them who by patient continuence in well doing seek, for glory, honor, immortality, eternal life." (Rom 2: 7.) So we see that the little word patience is of the greatest value to him who is seeking a home in the Kingdom. In the parable of the sower (Luke 8,–19,) we find use for patience again: "But that on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience." We will now look at Romans 5: 3: "And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also; knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience hope." Here we find tribulation worketh patience, patience experience, experience hope. "And hope maketh not ashamed." Again: "But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." (Rom. 8–25.) Again: "But in all things approving ourselve as the ministers of of God, in much patience, (not a little,) in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses," (2. Cor. 6: 4,) "Remembering with out ceasing your work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our father." (Thes. 1: 3.) "So that we ourselves glory in you in the Churches of God, for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure." (2 Thes. 1: 4.)

"But thou, oh man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness." (Tim. 6: 11.) "That the aged men be sober, grave, temperate sound in faith, in charity, in patience." (Titus 2: 2.) "That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." (Heb. 6: 15.)

But with out further quotations, all can see and understand my position, viz: That with out patience it will be impossible to gain a home in the kingdom, which is soon to be set up under the whole heavens. Would you have immortality? Then remember it can only be obtained by patient continuence in well doing." Would you enjoy the promise made by God to Abraham? If so, Paul tells us, "Through faith and patience we are to inherit the promise." Would you win in the Christian race? If so, "Run with patience the race that is set before you looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith." (Heb. 12: 1–2.) Do you want to know a man who practiced patience? If so, find out who was the author of the eighteenth Book of the Old Testament. Would you know who is better than the proud? The wisest man that has or ever will live, says "The patient in spirit." (Eccl. 7; 8.) Are you looking for the soon coming of Jesus? If so, "Be patient therefore brethren unto the coming of our Lord. Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receives the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient, establish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."(James 5: 7–8.)

"Even so come Lord Jesus," and bring life and immortality for thy waiting bride. And may writer and reader compose a part of the number that shall sing the songs of final and eternal redemption, is my prayer.

SAID a visitor at a country almshouse to a feeble, palsy shaken old man—

"What are you doing, Wisby?"

"Waiting, sir."

"And for what?"

"For the appearance of my Lord."

"And what makes you wait for his appearing?"

"Because, sir, I expect great things then. He has promised a crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing."

Better have Wisby's hope than Victoria's septer, Lazarus' rags than Dives' purple. Better is poverty with piety, than riches with perdition. —Heber.

*This rendering of Titus 2: 13—which, it will be noticed, differs somewhat from our version,—is said by Dr. Cumming to be "the literal translation of the verse, as any classical scholar well knows;" and it may be added that Rev. A. Barnes in his "Notes" sustains this translation.

Advent Christian Times.

WM. SHELDON, - EDITOR.

Give your Name, Postoffice, County and State every time you write.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, September 30, 1873.

IN BR. ROYCE's article in last TIMES, for "re-sown," should have read "unsown grain."

WE expect to attend the Indiana Conference, beginning October 2, at Union Mills.

IN last paper, article "Views of the Jews," 13th line of last paragraph, for respected Jesus, read rejected Jesus.

"THE DISEMBODI[illegible] EXAMINED" has been unexpectedly delayed, but will now soon be ready for distribution. Those who have sent orders will be patient a few days.

IT is time we give more attention to our young people in our paper. This we intend to do. "Uncle Simeon" is interesting himself in their behalf. Let others who have the ability do likewise.

BR. H. H. TUCKER, of Dudley, Mass., was ordained to the work of the ministry on the 11th of September, at the Alton Bay camp-meeting. May the Lord help him in the good work of saving men.

WE hear good reports from the Alton Bay camp-meeting. It is almost too large, having about 300 board tents, aside from the many made of canvas. The congregations were so large that several speakers were employed at the same hour, at different stands.

"THE SCIENTIFIC FARMER" is the name of a new and beautifully illustrated paper just started by C. F. Blakely, 107 Fifth Avenue, Chicago. It has 16 pp., a size smaller than this paper, enclosed in a beautiful cover. Published monthly at $1.50 per annum.

THE annual report of the Eastern Publishing Society shows that the Crisis is in a flourishing condition. It is an excellent organ, and is to be edited jointly, the coming year, by Brn. Couch and Grant. Its present circulation is not far from 10,000 copies. May it continue to do good, as it has done in former years.

OUR subscription list should, and can be greatly enlarged. It is now the right season of the year to obtain new subscribers for THE TIMES. But who shall do it? Ministers and people. Let not one wait for another. We can easily add 1,000 new subscribers to our list this coming fall and winter if all will interest themselves.

WE are glad to learn that a noble effort was made at Springfield and Alton Bay, to raise funds to carry "the gospel of the kingdom" to the South. We trust the matter will not end here. Br. P. G. Bowman, from South Carolina, is on a mission to New England to raise funds to help on the good work in the South, and is meeting with success.

ALL letters for the paper, all obituary notices, and articles for publication should be sent to the Editor, at 25 West Lake street Chicago, and not to Brodhead, Wis. Only private letters should be sent to Brodhead, and even those may be sent to Chicago by writing "personal," on the envelope. By remembering this, delays will be prevented.

WE call attention to the letter in another column, written by Eld. C. W. Turner, a Methodist minister for many years, addressed to the presiding elder of the Milwaukee District. Br. Turner has taken a stand for the truth, and has left the M. E. Church. We hope to hear from him often. He will now publish and scatter his views in tract form among his former friends and brethren in the ministry. May he induce many to use the eye-salve of truth.

GENERATION.—Br. D. M. Peavy writes: "Br. Sheldon: I experience much difficulty in the attempt to interpret the word generation to mean 100 years."

The term "generation" does not always signify a cycle of time, and furthermore, when it does, it does not invariably indicate 100 years—it often means a shorter term of years. The generation that were to "see" the last signs must be a generation of people, and not of time, for people can "see," while time cannot.

THE RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, (Spiritualist organ) of Chicago, is making war on Moses Hull and Victoria Woodhull. How about a house divided against itself? Moses is starting a new paper in Boston. This Chicago paper is down on Moses and Victoria for carrying free-love principles too far. It is said pots and kettles do sometimes accuse each other of being black; and Satan sometimes rebukes sin to bring himself a little credit. Doubtless Hull & Woodhull will retaliate by exposing their accusers. We shall watch the fight.

Abiding in the True Vine.

We read about "the vine of the earth," but that is not the "true vine." This "vine of the earth" is full of clusters—it is a productive vine—but its fruit is all carnal in its nature. To be right before God we must get out of this vine, and get into Christ, "the true vine," so that as branches derive vigor from the vine they are connected with, we may constantly be replenished with a holy unction emanating from him. We invite attention to the following remarks, found in a little tract entitled "Abiding in Christ:"

There are three declarations made in the Scriptures concerning those who abide in Christ, which all the children of God would do well to ponder deeply, with a view to applying the question to their own souls, whether they are in very truth really abiding in him, or whether, through ignorance or unbelief, or, still worse, through an unwillingness to live the life of holiness which is necessarily involved in such abiding, they are still living and walking in the flesh. For this abiding in Christ is a practical experience, and brings forth practical fruit.

It is very blessed for the child of God to know his complete judicial standing in Christ, and his perfect acceptance before God in Him. But far more blessed is it to know an actual completeness in him, and a real and experimental dwelling in him, and he in us, whereby he becomes, not only judicially but actually, our life, and we come to know what it is to have him to work in us, to will and to do of his own good pleasure.

Let us look, then, at what are in these declarations concerning those who abide in Christ.

1. "Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not." (1 John 3:6.)

2. "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit." (John 15:5.)

3. "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." (John 15:7.)

Just the three things that of all others the souls of God's children cry out for are here declared to be theirs on one condition; and if they have them not, it must be because that condition is not fulfilled. Now, beloved Christian reader, are these things true of you? Pause for a moment, and solemnly consider this question. Is it true of you, that you are not sinning? Is it true of you, that you are bringing forth much fruit? Is it true of you, that you ask what you will, and get it? If not, what then is the necessary conclusion? What can it be but that you are not abiding in Christ?

Your understanding of God's truth may be very extensive; your faith, as regards justification, may be unwavering; your knowledge of the Scriptures may be very exact and critical; the typical and prophetic teaching of the Bible may have been very much opened to your understanding; but do these things avail to keep you from sin, to make you fruit-bearing branches, and to give you power to prevail with God? They cannot; for the positive declaration of our Lord is, that if we are not abiding in him, we can do nothing, nothing! Let this word ring through your souls. No fruit-bearing, no practical righteousness, no walking worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, no power, nothing that will not be burned up in the day when the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is! Beloved readers, can you contemplate these things without sorrow of soul, and earnest longings to know for yourselves what it is to abide in Christ?

Believers, let me make a solemn appeal to you. Do not your hearts condemn you because of unfaithfulness and sin, and have they not often in times past condemned you? Have you not repented, confessed, and been forgiven times without number, until you have become at last almost too much ashamed and disheartened to seek forgiveness again knowing that the same temptations will probably bring the same defeats? Does not the seventh chapter of Romans describe your experience far more fully than any other chapter in the Bible? Have not the commands to holiness, which stand out so clearly on almost every page of God's Word, seemed at times almost like a mockery to you, so impossible have you found it to obey them? Is not the First Epistle of John a sealed book to you? and are not its declarations concerning the practical freedom from committing sin of those who are born of God, unfathomable mysteries? Do you know what it is to be so "freed from sin," as to have your "fruit unto holiness;" to be so "dead to sin," as to find it impossible to "live any longer therein?"

It may be that outward sins do not much trouble you; but that what you mourn are sins of the heart, of the affections; roots of bitterness; intellectual apprehension of truth without corresponding moral results; much knowledge, but little power; much activity, but little godly zeal; much that is earthly, but little that is heavenly, in your walk and conversation. Can you think that this is what it is to "walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing?" Is this what it is to "stand perfect and complete in all the will of God?" Is there nothing better for you than this? Surely the Bible does not tell you so. God has not called you to such a calling as this. Christ did not die to leave you in this sad condition. The fault cannot be in the salvation he has procured, but must instead lie in your apprehension of that salvation, or in the failure of your faith to grasp it. Need you seek further for an answer than your own sad admission that you are not abiding in Christ? If you are not abiding there, God says you can do nothing. Oh, friends, it is one thing to talk about abiding in Christ, but it is far different really to be there; and if the fruits of that abiding are not yours, be sure your souls know it not, however clear the doctrine concerning it may be to your understanding.

But perhaps you question whether it is your privilege always to abide in Christ. Has he not commanded it? and is not his command equivalent to a promise? Think you that he meant you only to make of him a transient refuge in times of peculiar trial or especial service, and that at other times you were to abide in self again? Ah no! this you cannot believe. Our blessed Lord meant just what he said—that he would be our abiding place, where we might dwell, and walk, and lie down in quietness and rest of soul forever. And so fully did he mean this, that he sets forth the destiny of those who do not abide, in language that may well make you pause. Do not deceive yourselves. It is your privilege, nay rather, it is your duty, to abide in Christ; and the most fearful sin of all the sins you are committing is this one, that you are not so abiding. Fly, then, to your refuge, and hide yourselves where your life is hid—with Christ in God.

The one great practical question of importance to you, then, at the present time, is how to abide. Dear friends, this can only be by faith. Efforts will not hide you in Christ; works will not; neither resolutions nor prayers can take you there. Faith alone is the entrance to him; faith alone can take that mighty step out of self and into Christ, and faith alone can keep you there.

But what sort of faith is it that can accomplish so wondrous a transformation? The answer to this is very simple. It is the same sort of faith as that which at first gave you the forgiveness of sins, and made you children of God. It is faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and the work he accomplished, and faith in God's record concerning that work. You have hitherto believed that his death procured for you redemption from hell, and deliverance from the stains and guilt of sin, and made you in Christ judicially complete in the sight of God. But if you should see that his death purchased far more for you than this, would it require any different sort of faith to believe it, than it did to believe that which has already been made yours by faith? Assuredly not; on the contrary, you could not dare to doubt it. What is meant, then, by such passages as these: "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God;" "Buried with him by baptism unto death;" "Quickened together with him;" "Seated in heavenly places in him;" "Created in him to good works;" "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature;" "Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates;" "Christ liveth in me;" "Ye are the sample of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them and walk in them;" "He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit;" "Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God in Jesus Christ our Lord?"

Do not these passages, and others like them, teach us that the death of Christ has purchased for believers more than mere deliverance from hell, even the blessed and glorious reality of being indwelt by the living God? Our Lord's crucifixion opened to us the portals of the life in himself. He took us down into death with him, that we might rise in him in newness of life. He shed his precious blood not only to put our sins away, but also to make us one with himself, that he might dwell in us and we in him,—that we might be one, even as he and His Father are one. Oh, my friends, what a wondrous mystery, and what an amazing blessing is this! The soul hasteneth from words in touching such a theme! But surely, if this is what he died for, then, marvelous as it is, this grace is ours—to dwell in God and God in us; for if we have any share at all in the death of Christ, if he bore our sins and carried our iniquities, then all the purchase of his death must necessarily be ours; and of us, even of us, vile and unworthy as we are in ourselves, is this declaration true, that "ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them and walk in them." Ponder these words, believer, and tell me, thou who hast believed that thy sins were all atoned for by the death of Christ, Canst thou believe this too? Can thy faith grasp such a wondrous, unspeakable glory as this? Canst thou say now, with Paul, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me,"—and dost thou mean it? If so, thou art abiding in Christ; for to abide in him is to make pratically ours, by faith, what is ours already by the purchase of his death. Paul prays for the Ephesians, that Christ might dwell in their hearts by faith. He died on purpose that he might dwell there, but his indwelling only becomes a practical reality to us when we believe. This may seem a paradox, that we are in Christ by right of his death, and yet we are not practically in him until we believe. But so God teaches us; and in the matter of justification we have long ago learned not to wonder at the mystery, for when we believed that our sins were atoned for, we believed a thing already true in Christ, but not really made ours until our faith grasped it.

Let us not stumble then at this mystery, but turn to some further Scriptures which declare it. In 1 John 4:15, God tells us, "Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God." Canst thou believe this reader? Thou confessest that Jesus is the Son of God, and hast long confessed it; dost thou believe that God dwelleth in thee, and thou in him? For if thou dost, thou art abiding in Christ, and all that is declared to be true of those who abide, will straightway become true of thee: thou wilt not sin, thou wilt bring forth much fruit, and thou mayest ask what thou wilt and get it. Take the comfort of this to thy soul. Thou art abiding in Christ, and he is working in thee to will and to do of his good pleasure.

But perhaps thou wilt say, "I have always believed I was in Christ, yet could never say I was abiding in him." What is this but actually to say that thou hadst two lives, one in Christ, and one in thyself; whereas God says, "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." Thou calledst thy life in him judicial; but did not this leave room for a life out of him,—a life of continual sin? And how dishonoring this must be to the work of Christ, as well as contrary to the whole testimony of the Bible. No wonder that word concerning those who "walk after the flesh" was true of thee, that thou couldst "not cease from sin." But there are better things in store for thee than this. Let us look at another Scripture: "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness." Does the Spirit of God dwell in thee, believer? Then God says thou art not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, and Christ is in thee. Canst thou say this too? If not, then art thou not driven to the alternative of saying that the Spirit of God does not dwell in thee? for has not God joined these two things together? Surely, from this thy soul will recoil. God says it then, that thou art not in the flesh but in the Spirit, and that Christ is in thee; and incomprehensible as it may seem, and above all thy senses, still if God says it, it must be true, and thou must believe it. And this is what it is to have Christ to dwell in thy heart by faith. This is what it is to abide in Him.

Hast thou ever known what it was to experience this for a little while? Hast thou ever been driven by the storms of life, or its fierce temptations, to hide in Christ for a moment, and felt the blessedness of such a biding? Hide in him always and forever; make him thy continual abiding place, and go no more out. Or hast thou ever known what it was to have transient visits from him, when, as an old writer says, thy soul being truly melted and tender before him, he has come into thee as a wafaring man that tarries for a night? And hast thou found such tarrying infinitely sweet and precious to thee? Let thy faith, then, open the door of thy heart to him now as his continual dwelling place; let thy faith draw him in there to make it his home, that he may from henceforth and for evermore walk in thee, and live in thee, and work in thee, and be thy life. Go to him and say, "Lord, I am abiding in Thee, and Thou art dwelling in me. I would not dare to say this if Thou hadst not said it, for every sense in me asserts the impossibility of it; but Thou hast said it, Thou hast declared that Thy death purchased this very thing, and therefore I do not disbelieve it. I am abiding in Thee, because Thou hast died for me." Take God thus at his word. Nakedly believe him without waiting for signs of feelings, and very soon it will be proved to thy own soul to be a blessed reality. Thou wilt find that thou art abiding in Christ, and that he is working in thee to will and to do of his good pleasure.

Thus thou wilt obey the command, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof." By faith thou wilt "put off the old man," and "put on the new;" by faith thou wilt crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts; by faith thou wilt abandon the flesh, and leaving it behind thee as a dead and corrupt thing, thou wilt step out of self and into Christ, and take up thy abode in him. All this thou wilt do by faith: but very soon thou wilt find it done to sense. The flesh will be found to be crucified and put off, and the Lord Jesus Christ will be put on, and thou wilt be able to say with Paul, "To me to live is Christ."

Then the mysteries of the Scriptures will be open to thee. Then the voice of the Spirit will be heard in thy soul, and thou wilt be able to follow his guidance. Then thou wilt realize the force of that passage, "He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk even as he walked." Then, as was said before, thou wilt know what it is not to sin, to bring forth much fruit, and to ask what thou wilt and get it Beloved child of God, let me entreat of thee to abide in Christ. Now, even now, by faith hide thyself in him, and take him for thy all in all. Thou art nothing, thou never canst be anything, but Christ died that he might be all to thee; and thou wilt find a rest to thy soul that no words can describe, if only thou wilt lose thyself in him. Let his sweet and perfect life flow through thee without hindrance on thy part. Bear about continually his dying, that so the life of Jesus may be made manifest in thy mortal body. Lose thy own life, to find his life made thine. Die, that thou mayest live.

And do this continually. Never let Satan tempt thee out of Christ, or persuade thee to believe that thou art not abiding in him. Resist him, steadfast in the faith, and he shall flee from thee. But if for a moment he should succeed in enticing thee out of thy hiding-place, and thou find thyself a mark for his fiery darts, oh, flee back again to the blood of cleansing; hide thee in thy impregnable fortress, and lose thyself again in Christ. So shalt thou come at last to be a pillar in the temple of thy God to go no more out; and thou shalt know in thy own experience the fulfillment of the prayer with which we close: "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead of our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

That Perplexing Theory.

The Bible theory of a resurrection, is so far above human comprehension, that it is perplexing thousands. It is made so prominent in the Bible that it cannot be disposed of with a mere sneer. The theology of the age which passes current, and arrogates to itself the tittle of orthodoxy, has no need of a litteral resurrection; hence, efforts are being made on every hand to make it appear that the resurrection is spiritual in its nature. Paul affirmed, "Some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come"? And that is just what is now being said. We are told that it is a philosophical impossibility for the material body to be released from the power of death, and so the claim is being made that the resurrection simply subtracts a spiritual body from the material body; thus assuming that there is a spiritual body residing in each material body. But Paul, the only inspired writer who ever spoke of a spiritual body, never intimated that the spiritual body was an inside body, to be released at death; but simply taught that the natural body should be transformed into a spiritual body at the resurrection: "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body:" So this cuts of the theory of a spiritual body before the resurrection dawns. And more than this, the apostle proceeds to illustrate his meaning by referring to the resurrected body of Christ, in these words: "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written. The first man, Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual; but that which is natural and afterward that which is spiritual." (1 Cor. 15:44—46) So the natural body has its day first and is "sown a natural body;" and "afterward," as in the case of Christ, it is "raised a spiritual body," by the transforming power of Divinity. A spiritual body is not a spirit without a body, but a body spiritualized, or a body made spiritual at the resurection.

The claim is made without proof, and contrary to facts, that the spiritual body and the spirit are only two names for one thing; thus paving the way for the claim that the spirit it to be raised from the body, instead of having the material man raised.

The advocates of a resurrection of the spirit, who deny that the body is ever to rise, find it necessary to locate the resurrection at the hour of death, else they would be driven to the conclusion (1) that the spirit enters the grave with the body, thus conceding its mortality; or (2) that each man has two spirits, as one spirit is given up at death, as in Christ's death:—"Father into thy hands I commit my spirit;" and as in Stephen's case—"Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." Not being willing, however, to grant two spirits to each man—one to leave the body at death, and one to be resurrected from the body at some later date—they have fixed upon the hour of death as the time when the spirit is resurrected from the body. Well, if that is the time of the resurrection, millions must thus have been resurrected before the first Advent, for millions had previously died. Now comes the difficulty. How then could Christ have been "the first born from the dead"? (Col. 1:18.) Or how could he by his resurrection have "become the first fruits of them that slept"? (1 Cor. 15:20.) This fact alone refutes the claim of a spirit-resurrection.

Christ was the first one ever raised to immortality, as a sample of "the better resurrection." Others had simply been awakened without being changed. The saints, too, will rise with bodies at Christ's coming—"Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." (Phil. 3:21.) Not change our spirit, but body. "Shall also qucken (make alive] your mortal bodies" (Rom. 8:11), not immortal spirit-bodies, but "mortal bodies."

God can make alive our "mortal bodies," just as in the care of Christ: "He which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus." (2 Cor. 4:14.) His resurrection was not at death, but three days after, so it was not a resurrection of his spirit.

Because the philosophy of the resurrection of the body cannot be explained, the doctrine is being extensively repudiated by the would-be-wise theologians of the day; but this principle fully carried out would unsettle faith in every miracle recorded in the Bible; for the resurrection itself is nothing less than a miracle.

No miracle ever has been or ever can be explained, except on the principle of the unlimited power of God, which is incomprehensible to man. The admission of God's power to work any miracle, is a concession of his power to miraculously raise the dead; for if he really has any miraculous power, who shall limit it because of inability to measure it? Well might Paul propound the question—"Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

And in response to the query of the skeptic—"How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" Paul responds—"Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened [made alive] except it die"; so the resurrection will make alive a body that has died, instead of liberating a deathless soul from a dying body. "But that which thou sowest [in sowing grain], thou sowest not that body that shall be [at the harvest], but bare grain [unclothed grain], it may chance [to be a sowing] of wheat, or of some other grain: but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body [in a clothed state—not naked grain].... There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial.... So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption.... It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body"—the same body clothed with immortality.

Soul of Man.

Since the term "soul," so often used in the Bible, is sometimes used to signify the person entire, sometimes the mind, and sometimes the life of the person; and since it is so often said to die, and since there can be no mind without life, how can a soul, in any sense, live after the death of the person? When the person dies, it is true that the life leaves the body, but not as a personality, for it never was a personality, but simply an element. If man could not live without an inside personality to make him live, neither could the horse live without an inside horse to give life to his external horseship; and it the outward person could not live without an inward person to produce life, neither could that inward person live without another inward person to make it live; and then that second inward person would just as really need a third inward person to cause it to live, and so on, till a thousand inward persons are found; and then we should have to look for still another inward person to produce life, or else fall back upon the reasonable fact that life is an element that causes a personality to live, instead of being a personality itself; and when we take that ground, it is plain that the first personality could live on the same principle, independent of an inward personality.

Life leaves the body under the stroke of death in the same sense in which light leaves the candle when blown out—it is not still in existence in another locality. So when soul signifies life, death kills it; and when it indicates mind, death kills it, for there can be no mind without life; and when it signifies person, as all admit, death kills it. There is, however, a life in Christ, the property of the saint, which death cannot kill. But present life is obliterated by death. By killing the person, the life is killed; by killing the life, the mind is killed; for mind depends on life, and life cannot exist independent of an organism, as a personality, being only an element, or result of the spirit of life. The Bible reads thus:

"All they that go down to the dust, shall bow before him; and none can keep alive his own soul." (Ps. 22:29.)

"Thou hast delivered my soul from death." (Ps. 56:13.)

"He spared not their soul from death." (Ps. 78:50.)

"Let my soul live and it shall praise thee." (Ps. 119:175)

"The eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him,....to deliver their soul from death." (Ps. 33:19.)

"My soul chooseth strangling and death rather than my life." (Job 7:15.)

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die." (Ezek. 18:4)

"Eight souls were saved by water." (1 Pet. 3:20)

"Every living soul died in the sea." (Rev. 16:3)

"What man is he that liveth and shall not see death? Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave?" (Ps. 89:48)

"O Lord, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave." (Ps. 30:3.)

"His soul draweth near unto the grave." (Job. 33:22)

"He will deliver his soul from going into the pit." (Job 33:28.)

"Thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption." (Is. 38:17.)

"God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." (Ps. 49:14.)

"Deliver my soul from the sword." (Ps. 22:20.)

"They smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them." (Josh. 11:11.)

Where is the proof that soul signifies a personality independent of man, instead of meaning the man entire, or the life or mind of man?

Disembodied Existence.

Job looked for an existence in the future—subsequent to the stroke of death—but did he look for a disembodied existence? If so, where is the proof? Not in the Bible; for Job in contemplating the arrival of the latter day, says: "In my flesh shall I see God." This stands in the way of the theory of a disembodied existence.

In advocating doctrines that are void of proof, it is sometimes thought best to manufacture proof. This is true of the doctrine of man's disembodied existence. An effort is being made to convert Job's testimony into evidence of a disembodied state, by setting up the claim that Job, when correctly translated, did not say, "Yet in my flesh shall I see God," but said, "Without my flesh shall I see God." The fallacy of this claim is apparent at a glance, for in the context Job tells us when he expected to see God: "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh, [or, without my flesh], shall I see God." (Job 19:25, 26.) When did he expect to see God? Not during the interval between death and the resurrection, but "at the latter day," at which time the resurrection is due, for Jesus affirmed, "I will raise him up at the last day," (John 6:40); so if Job was not to see his Redeemer till the latter day, it is a shocking blunder to say that he will then see him without his flesh, for if a disembodied state were to precede that epoch, it would then terminate; besides it is not reasonable to suppose that Job would overleap thousands of years of glory in the presence of God, and not speak of seeing God till the arrival of the latter day, if such glory were to exist in the intermediate state. The margin reads: "After I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, out of my flesh shall I see God." When? "After I shall awake"—not during the sleep of death. How? "Out of my flesh;" that is, out of my fleshly eyes. This reading being misapprehended, doubtless led to the erroneous rendering: "Without my flesh."

No man is so happy as a real Christian; none so rational, so virtuous, so amiable. How little vanity does he feel, though he believes himself united to God! How far is he from abjectedness when he ranks himself with the worms of the earth.—Pascal.

Without Father or Mother.

BROTHER SHELDON:—Please explain through the Times, the 3d verse, 7th chapter in Hebrews, and oblige me.

M. A. BARKER.

As we have several times given an exposition of this text, we will just quote it, giving only a few points: "Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither begining of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually."

Paul is here referring to Melchisedec, not as a man, but as a Priest, in which respect he and Christ were alike, and entirely unlike the priests under the law, who must have a priestly record of father, mother, a record of birth and death, &c.; but in the priesthood thus carefully recorded, neither Christ or Melchisedec had father or mother; yet as men they both had a mother; in the record neither of them had a begining of days or end of life; yet it is certain that Christ died as a man, and so did Melchisedec. Christ "sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood." He was a priest of another order, having no begining of days or end of life in the Levitical record of priests. He is a "priest forever"—or to the age.

The Christian Era.

BR. SHELDON.—Would you oblige by answering the following question in THE TIMES?

Have we reasons to believe that any mistake has been made in keeping time since the date of the vulgar era? That is, has the earth made 1873 revolutions around the sun since the beginning of that date to January 1, 1874, A. D., and oblige yours, expecting eternal life at the appearing of our Lord Jesus.

C. W. CONOLLY.

If all nations had began to count from the Christian era in the time of Christ, as they now do, there could be but little chance for discrepancy in computation; but this method of reckoning was not commenced until the fifth century. From that epoch no doubt the time has been correctly kept; and there is but little room to doubt that Christ was born four or five years before the Christian era (so-called) began. If there is any mistake it must be trifling. Historical events are chronologically located by astronomy in such a manner as to make it pretty certain that Herod died about 1878 years ago, and Christ was certainly born previous to his death.

A Sweet Faced Enemy.

Perhaps it is not generally known that the prayers, as well as the sermons of Mr. Beecher are reported weekly. In a recent prayer thus reported in the Plymouth Pulpit, the following words were used: "Bring us more and more to see how sweet the face of death is...... May we behold death wonderingly. and say, 'It is the coming of the Son of man—of him that loved us and gave himself for us.'"

Death is an "enemy," according to Paul; yet Mr. Beecher thinks it has a "sweet face," and recognizes it as the coming of the Son of man. Is the Son of man an "enemy"? If Mr. Beecher and Paul are both right, this conclusion is inevitable. Which is right? Paul, or Beecher?

Tafel's Translation.

We have just received the second part of Tafel's interlinear translation of the Hebrew scriptures, and are much pleased with its general character. Price to regular subscribers $2.00 per part for the Hebrew, and $1.50 per part for the Greek. They are being published alternately, one part every three months. It will require a number of years to finish the work. Published by L. H. Tafel, 635 Arch St., Philadelphia. The two Hebrew parts already published reach from the 1st of Genesis to the 27th of Exodus. Critical students of the Bible will admire it; but general regret is expressed that its completion is so far in the future.

Western Tract Fund.

Our book and tract shelves are nearly empty. We need to issue new editions of many of our valuable productions, but do not wish to contract new debts just as we are getting out. Probably some who have not aided us in obliterating the debt, will deem it a pleasure to help us in this department, and thus aid us in keeping free from debt. We ought to be able to keep on hand a quantity of works to scatter free in new fields, but it costs money to print them, and doubtless many will deem it a pleasure to help publish them. Let us again open the "Western Tract Fund." Who will donate under this head?

Miscellaneous.

AT HOME.

—A whole family, named Walker, were arrested in Tremont, N. Y., Sept. 21, on a charge of counterfeiting currency and stamps. A large quantity was found on their premises, and material for the manufacture of more.

—An unknown burglar was shot at Quincy, Ill. Sept. 23, while attempting to force an entrance into the residence of Mrs. L. B. Finlay, on North Fifth street. Mrs. F. was alone with her daughter in the house at the time, and, hearing the burglar, challenged him, but he still tried to get in, when she fired two shots, and the ruffian retreated, groaning and staggering. The next morning traces of blood were found around her house, but the burglar escaped.

—Passengers who arrived at Memphis, Sept. 20, by steamer from up the river state that for several days past the Asiatic cholera has prevailed at Osceola, Ark., a small town forty miles above here, and that there were some six or seven deaths there yesterday. The negroes are all leaving the town, and the cotton-pickers on the plantations in the vicinity are getting away as fast as they can. This will seriously inconvenience the gathering of the crop there, and, unless the panic subsides, there will be much cotton lost.

—The GRAPHIC BALOON bubble has burst. September 19th was the day appointed for the ascent. Prof. Donaldson and eight men commenced at 3 o'clock a. m. the work of inflating. At eight o'clock, when about one fourth filled with gas, the baloon became unmanageable, and, as the safety-valve would not work, Prof. Donaldson cut a hole six feet square in the canvas and the monster was brought into subjection. After two days' delay the gas was again let in. This time the monster exploded, so there is an end for a time to aerial navigation.

—About 2 o'clock Sept. 22, a steam boiler in a small out house in the rear of King & Co.'s feed mills, Nos. 509 and 511 Tenth avenue, New York, exploded, blowing both ends of the building in which it stood out. An end of the boiler passed almost intact through a stable on the Thirty-eighth street side, and instantly killed a horse. The fragments of the other end smashed the corridors in the tenement houses Nos. 503 to 508 West Thirty-ninth street. One piece, weighing about thirty pounds, crashed through a wall into a bedroom where a man and a boy were sleeping, and destroyed nearly everything in the apartment without injuring the inmates.

—Tallahassee, Fla., Sept. 21: "A terrific storm prevailed throughout this section of the country on Friday morning. Several stores were unroofed, thirty or forty houses were blown down, and several others were badly damaged. A great number of gin houses were destroyed. The crops are considered ruined. Three or four lives were lost, and several persons were wounded. A large number of cattle, etc., were killed. The roads were blocked by fallen trees, and the telegraph wires and fences are down for miles. The loss in this county is immense. St. Marks was completely swept away, only two houses being left standing, and twenty families were made homeless. Newport is also reported swept away."

ABROAD.

—A large reduction is being made in the Austrian standing army.

—His Majesty King Victor Emmanuel has gone to Berlin, where he will remain several days.

—The number of deaths in Paris, by cholera, from the 9th to the 14th inst., is officially reported to be 121.

—The volcano Manna Loe is in a state of eruption. It can be seen more than 100 miles distant, and illuminates the whole island.

—The Emperor of Austria will visit St. Petersburg in January, and will probably attend the wedding of the Duke of Edinburg.

—PARIS, Sept. 22.—It is reported that Count de Chambord has given his supporters assurance of a peaceful policy, especially with regard to Italy, in case he should be placed on the French throne.

—Gen. Garibaldi, who has had a hand in every foreign war of any consequence for the last generation, has offered his services to the Republic of Spain. President Castelar has declined them on the ground that his help is not needed.

—The fire by which Plaza Vapor, Havana, was destroyed was a very disasterous one. The total loss is variously estimated at from three to eight millions of dollars. The insurance only amounts to $524,000, nearly all in English companies.

—The admiralty Lords received information London, Sept. 18, that boats belonging to the British navy have been attacked by pirates near Penang, and two of their officers wounded. The man-of-war Thalia has been despatched to the scene of the outrage, with orders to chastise the pirates.

—The whaling steamer Arctic has arrived at Dundee, Scotland, having on board the remainder of the crew of the Polaris, who were picked up, July 20, by the whaler Ravenscraig, from Dundee, twenty miles south of Cape York, in boats constructed from remnants of the bulwarks of the Polaris. By direction of the chief officer of the Ravenscraig, the rescued crew were transferred to the Arctic.

—The King's Government, Sandwich Islands, has arrived at the conclusion that it is to the highest interests of the country to conclude a treaty with the United States on the basis of the cession of Pearl River Harbor. The King has ordered his Minister of Foreign Affairs to notify the United States Minister that he (the King) is ready to negotiate such a treaty. The foreign and native population generally favor the project. King Lunalilo is dangerously ill.

Minnesota Camp-Meeting.

BR. SHELDON—We had a very interesting and profitable time at our State camp-meeting and annual conference. The spirit of the Lord seemed to pervade throughout the entire meeting. Br. and Sr. Mansfield were with us and preached the Word in power and demonstration of the Spirit.

The weather, most of the time, was unfavorable to holding the meetings in the open air; for that reason some concluded, after the first Sunday, to adjourn the meeting to Winona. In pursuance to that decision they repaired immediately—together with Br. and Sr. Mansfield—and accordingly commenced meetings in the Advent Church in this city, on the following Tuesday evening. The meetings that have been held here have been blessed to many. It was apparent at the commencement, from the large attendance, etc., that a deep interest was manifested. We assembled in the morning at ten o'clock, and every evening, and the following Sunday three times: at the close of the meetings we were unable—so large was the attendance—to seat all the people. Many will doubtless never forget the last Saturday night, after Sr. Mansfield had preached.

Br. Mansfield felt it his duty to invite all forward that felt their need of the witness of the Spirit, and a deeper practical experience of religion; many accepted the invitation and came forward. I think I never was in a meeting where there was a greater unanimity of feeling and blessing among the ministerial brethren, believing that it is high time for the church to rise on higher ground, and to contend for the "witness of the Spirit," the "seal of the Holy Spirit of promise," and the "sure confidence once delivered to the saints. God help us to seek the old paths, and walk in them.

THOMAS K. ALLEN.

Winona, Sept. 22, 1873.

Tent Meeting Report---No. 4.

This meeting commenced August 15, and closed the 25th. All that could be done to make the tent attractive, as a place of meeting, was done by the friends. The floor was covered with clean saw dust: it was seated with chairs from the hall, also the stand and platform. Altogether it was a desirable place to spend a social hour, besides being located in the business part of the city. Yet the hearing was small throughout. All who did come observed good order. We slept quietly in the tent alone, save two nights, during our stay Tracts were taken away freely, and one good feature was discernible. that I seldom see elsewhere; that is this, in going about the city I never found where a tract had been torn up, but this I have often found elsewhere. I visited many of the business men, conversed with them freely, and gave them tracts; but their minds seemed as dark as midnight on the teaching of the Bible, and their feelings perfectly averse to obtaining any knowledge of it. The fact is, I never was in a place that was so much under Satanic influence as this city. Gambling, pleasure, whisky, beer and tobacco is the order of the day, and a part of the night. Singers' and Turners' Gardens are visited by thousands on Sunday evenings, cheered by music, and filled with beer, and steeped in tobacco, they seemed to be prepared for any work of the flesh. It is sickening to pass by those slums of vice, and smell the stench of beer and tobacco.

I boarded two blocks from the tent. In going that distance on Sunday morning, I met two loads of beer to supply the slums for the day. I was told that five teams were employed to supply the city with beer, and in passing around one square on Sunday, I saw four places open where billiards and cards were used. Truly, it represents a Sodom.

In visiting business men I often meet with such remarks: "What fools you must be to believe this world will ever end."

The ministers kept away, and their congregations generally. Vital godliness is almost out of the question. The church-going people are small in number, and take more interest in festivals, etc., than in godly edifying. Surely, it may be said to the saints of God in this place as it was said to the church in Sardis. (Rev. 3:4.)

Br. Brockwell was lame and could not help, (only by means), nor yet attend; but himself and wife are heart and hand in the work, so that the great burden of the meeting fell on Br. Marsh, who bore it joyfully and gladly; I may say like Paul, on another occasion, "These were my helpers in the Lord." God bless them.

P. W. HOUGH.

La Crosse City, Wis.

From Br. L. C. Kerr.

Any of the brethren wishing me to visit hem and preach, will please correspond with me at Coomer P. O., Niagara County, N. Y. I am a new beginner in the cause, but hope to do good.

Brn. D. A. Dickinson, J. Ridley, R. B. Dutton, I. Cooley, and J. Beddow were appointed to take charge of the tent, and put it in the field if possible. Br. J. Ridley was appointed to circulate a subscription and receive money, to pay a balance of forty dollars due on the tent.

Voted, that we request the churches belonging to this conference to raise, as a missionary fund, a sum equal to fifty cents per member, before the next annual conference, said sum to be paid to the Treasurer of the conference. And we request the ministers to keep this before the churches until they shall act in the matter.

The following preamble and resolution was adopted:

WHEREAS, The business session of this conference necessarily takes from the interest of the camp meeting, thus hindering its workings; therefore,

Resolved, That the two be separated, and that the next annual conference be not held at the same time as the camp meeting.

Brn. J. Ridley, C. W. Pitsor, and H. H. Janes were chosen as a committee to locate and appoint the next annual conference.

Br. F. H. Kenney and Sr. H. A. Plank withdrew from the conference.

The "proposition" for a union from the Christian Conference was presented, and the following amendment offered: That we act in harmony and with the co-operation of the conference in the southern part of the State; passed as amended.

A committee consisting of G. Dean, I. Cooley, W. H. Connell, C. L. Jones, D. A. Dickinson, and J. Ridley were appointed to confer with the committee from the Christian Conference, and, if they accept the amendment, to act with them in carrying out the proposition.

J. RIDLEY, Secretary.

P. S.—The camp-meeting was good. There was a good attendance from the surrounding country, also from Manchester. There were many who bore witness to Jesus' power to save, who, years ago, were in the service of Satan. There were five baptized who started during the meeting to serve the Lord; (I baptized four more the Sunday following.) Wanderers were reclaimed and the Lord's people strengthened, and much prejudice removed from the minds of those that had heard of us; but had never heard us before. At our love feast, Sunday morning, seventy testified for Jesus in about twenty minutes, and at the close of the meeting, Sunday evening, over one hundred gathered around the table to commemorate the death of our absent Lord. It was a season long to be remembered, the results of which can only be known in eternity. To the Lord be all the praise.

J. RIDLEY.

From Mary A. Griffin, Minnesota.

I see by THE TIMES that small sums are accepted, as well as the large ones, to help lift this debt of the Society. I send one dollar to be applied on the debt. My means are limited at present, or I would gladly make it more. I read THE TIMES with the greatest interest, and love the truth it advocates. It is our weekly preacher. I am not a member of the Church yet, but if God in his providence sees best to place me where I could attend the Advent meetings, there my heart would be also.

From Geo. M. Hutton, Wis.

The Southern Wisconsin camp-meeting, held at Belleville, Wis, has just closed. From first to last our dear Saviour was present. In some of the meetings the foretaste seemed more like the aftertaste; but generally the hours were of a solemn nature, because of the searching times of the Spirit. And we all feel as though the Lord had refined us.

We believe that all the lamps will be brightly burning when Jesus comes. Seven watchmen were there. Seven precious ones are nearing Christ, and are rejoicing in earnest hope. Many others are deeply interested, and we shall hear from them again. With an overflowing heart we praise the matchless name of Christ.

From Wm. Breach, Kentucky.

I must confess that THE TIMES has been a great help to me, to show me in what darkness I have been working for thirty years. By reading THE TIMES and searching the Scriptures, I have been able to learn that I am nothing more than a mortal. God has given me a law and I must keep it; for, if I do not, I must die, but not a death that never dies. I am a member of the Christian Church, sometimes called the Campbellites. I have to fight some hard battles, but the word of the Lord will conquer. We have got a few here who are contending for the faith once delivered to the saints. I am sorry to tell you that I have not got the means to send you now for more tracts, and pay you for THE TIMES, that I have had for the last year; but, if the Lord will, I will send it before my next year is out.

From D. S Morris, West Va.

Although surrounded with embarrassments, I cannot feel easy in my mind without responding to the call for help in relation to the debt that hangs over the Society. I therefore return the blank pledge filled up with the small sum of Four Dollars. I am an old afflicted man—a member of the Baptist Church.

I never can express in human language the light, the peace, the gladness, the holy gratitude, the love to God, awakened in my mind, by the announcement, illustration and defence of gospel truths as found in the writings of Adventists. Oh, how inexpressibly pleasing to the child of God to learn, by a proper understanding of his word, that God does not and will not delight himself in the eternal torment of the wicked, but that he will burn them up. Oh, that every lover of Jesus felt as I feel, and would give as I have given to the blessed cause, and the debt would be paid. Yours in the blessed hope.

From Eld. S. B. Mabry, Iowa.

BR. SHELDON.—I would like to say through the paper, to the friends scattered abroad in regions beyond, that I think (the Lord will), that I shall have time in connection with my labors here during the coming fall and winter week-day evening, and occasionally a Sabbath, in which to help in protracted meetings in destitute places, either in West Illinois or East Iowa, in vicinities where I can reach them readily from this place. As I believe with all my heart that earth's probation is almost over, I feel that I should labor where help is most needed; and I am willing to do all in my power to help sound forth the good news of the soon coming kingdom, and try to tell, by the grace of God, the story of "Jesus and his love" for perishing men.

Will any who need help let us know their condition, and, if we cannot go, we will try and send you some one who can. We shall attend to the demands already upon us as soon as possible. Expect soon to commence a meeting in South Clinton; then one west three miles, near the M. E. Tabernacle, and other places. Meanwhile, let us hear from any in more remote regions, and we will try to arrange accordingly. Pray for us, dear brethren, that the word of God may be duly spoken, from time to time, and become the power of God unto salvation to many precious souls. Our P. O. address is, until further notice, Clinton, Clinton County, Iowa.

From Eld. A. N. Seymour.

To the church of Christ scattered abroad, greeting.

DEARLY BELOVED:—God by his good providence, some thirty years since, opened our eyes to see the glowing light of heavenly wisdom; which has gradually increased, and which shines so vividly, and gloriously around our pathway at the present time, and we do thank God from the center of our affections, that so good and great a light, was ever rolled within our probationary pathway. It has been a matter of unspeakable satisfaction, and delight to us, while traveling the rugged journey of life. It has yielded a rich harvest of encouragement the whole distance. It has beckoned us onward, amidst all obstacles that thronged our pilgrim pathway, and threatened our demolition. It has buoyed up, and strengthened our energies while holding forth, to a perishing race, the "unsearchable riches of Christ." So that we never have seen one moment that we felt we could relinquish our claim to the blessed hope; or abandon our anticipations of soon realizing the full fruition of what God has promised; and to-day, although greatly worn out by the efforts of the past, we cherish the hope most firmly and sincerely, and more than ever desire to redouble our energies, and spend, and be spent, in the service of our dear Master. Some, perhaps, may have thought otherwise of us; as we have not for a time past given our sympathy and support to the cause in the west through the ADVENT CRISTIAN TIMES. To such we would say that the policy that has controlled its weekly issues did not seem to accord with apostolic usage, consequently we could not conscientiously approbate its course, or sympathise with its efforts, although the paper contained much that was truly beneficial to the waiting ones. We have anticipated a change. It has come; and doubtless it will be for the glory of God—the prosperity of the church of Christ, and the salvation of souls. Our heavenly father has already set his seal of approbation, to the change, by simultaneously moving upon the hearts of his tried children, so that they have, by their free will offerings, emancipated the Association, and cause from its rut of despondency; and all hearts are greatly elated, and encouraged at the prospect. God has been much better to them, than all their fears, thank his ever blessed name. Now that the basis of the Association has been changed so that each brother and sister, bears more or less of a responsibility in the publication of the paper, and now that new officers stand at the helm to continue its energies; every soul who loves God, truth, holiness, and the Lord's appearing, should stand up for Jesus, and respond with a hearty good will, to the call for temporal, mental, and spiritual aid; and if all go together, as they should, we bespeak for the blessed cause, an onward movement; a movement that will tell now, and surely in the coming day of the Lord Jesus. In order to warrant the fulfillment of such a condition of things, so very desirable, all who, in secret daily talk with God, should effectually and fervently pray for the Editor, for the Association in general, and all who may write for the press. Pray that union, love and the spirit of Christ' may permeate the entire ranks of zion's speedily coming king. May we all consecrate ourselves anew to God, and to the good work of saving those who are dead in trespasses, and in sins. Time is short. Hasten to Jesus.

From Elder C. W. Turner, Wis.

To W. P. STOWE, Presiding Elder, of Milwaukee District.

DEAR BROTHER:--It seems by the Sentinel, that my case occupied your attention somewhat, at your last District Conference.

The unsoundness of doctrine complained of consists, I suppose, in giving the term "death," as applied to the punishment of the wicked, its primary meaning, and not its poetic, or typical use, as is the fashion in modern pulpits. The District Conference hold that the death and punishment referred to is an eternal process.

I hold that it is eternal only in its results like "eternal judgment," and "eternal redemption," in the Book of Hebrews, and the "eternal fire" of the 7th verse of the Book of Jude, that burnt out ages ago, God teaching by example, as well as precept, lest our dullness should mistake hismeaning. That this was the doctrine of the Church in the first and second century, and until corrupted by Platonism, and the teaching of Origen in the succeeding century, and that it has been the doctrine of the Church of England, since 1562, when she purged away her popish errors, and expelled a contrary doctrine, is certain.

In the case of Wilson vs. Fendal, to determine whether endless torments was a doctrine of the Church of England, or not, the Lord Chancellor in the case, which occurred 1864, decided it was not. For, remarked his Lordship, to decide that it was, would be to restore the article expelled in 1562; that he had no power to do: and this was in the presence of two Arch Bishops, and had their approval and signature. (See the Report in the London Times for Feb. 20th, 1864.) That the theological articles of the M. E. Church, were taken by Mr. Wesley, the founder of our Church, from this source and contain not one word to prove the endless misery of the wicked, cannot be denied.

That in the teachings of the pulpits on this subject it has been some times spoken of as a Hell white heated, in which sinners burnt like salamanders for ever, and at others as a state of ill being, something alike grumbling toothache, with all the intervening shades of woe, you will not deny. That Dr. True, whose case was before the public last winter, and myself should be allowed to modify this doctrine, is but a fair demand.

The doctrine is founded on the immortality of the soul, which, says Gibbon, Renan, Dr John Mason, Good, and a host of Christian writers, some even who oppose us, was of eastern or heathen origin, found by the Jews in their captivity, and unrecognized by them before that time, but endorsed by Christ, which we deny; for to admit it would be to admit that Christ endorsed a doctrine that places him in antagonism with the Hebrew Prophets, with David and Solomon, who say "the dead know not any thing;" that "there is no work, nor knowledge in sheol;" and that the wicked shall "be as though they had not been." If we put the teachings of one inspired writer in antagonism with another, all our theology will go up like dust. Says Christ: "I am come that ye may have life;" "I give unto them eternal life;" which he never could do if they had it by nature, and without him. Theophelus, Bishop of Antioch, who died A.D. 181, in a treatise to his friend (it may be found in his second Book,) says "God made man neither mortal nor immortal, but capable of either, to be rewarded with immortality if deserving; if not, to experience mortality, or death. As soon as Origen had taught, in the next century, his modified Platonism, he had to invent Restorationism to go with it, for the human mind can not endure the idea of eternity of woe. Dr. Albert Barnes and many other sensible men seem to admit this, and most all have admitted of some purgatorial process by which they get them out. You rarely allude to the subject, but hold it as a sort of home guard or army of reserve to control extreme cases. Should it be preached once a month in all its horrors in your Churches, your ministers would soon preach to naked walls.

But as I mean to spend the remnant of life in trying to rout this doctrine, horse and foot, I withdraw from the M. E. Church, as I want no heated discussion. It is not the first time I have done this. In 1837 I endeavored to convince the Church that she ought no longer to throw her ogees over slavery.

But Dr. True, Floy, Lee, Mattack, myself and others were forced to retire, or yield to ecclesiastical will; and after thirty years of toil for reform the General Conference recinded its own acts against us, and received back these men as the Apostles of human freedom. And the secular papers at the time made a note of the fact; that the Church had come in behind the nation in the work of reform.

I find Dr. True standing by my side again, though I have had no concert with him. And I think that in a short time after the laity have received this doctrine, it will cover your altars, and be heard from your pulpits.

May we soon see that God is not what our imagination, andtheology has painted him to be; but good, even in his primitive acts, suffering the curtain of perpetual death to fall on that part of his creatures only, who failing to work out their own salvation through faith in his Son, and whose continued existence in sin would be an infinite evil to themselves; his goodness in this appearing so striking as to lead the redeemed to say, "Hallelujah! the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!

1. "God's character saved from the misrepresentation of his friends."

2. Man saved from the awful thought that some of his elder brothers have been in hell for the past five thousand years.

3. There can be no conflict in the teachings of the Inspired writers. Some of them do deny immortality to sin and sinners; therefore none could have held or taught their immortality.

Minnesota Camp-Meeting.

Br. Sheldon—We had a very interesting and profitable time at our State camp-meeting and annual conference. The spirit of the Lord seemed to pervade throughout the entire meeting. Br. and Sr. Mansfield were with us and preached the Word in power and demonstration of the Spirit.

The weather, most of the time, was unfavorable to holding the meetings in the open air; for that reason some concluded, after the first Sunday, to adjourn the meeting to Winona. In pursuance to that decision they repaired immediately—together with Br. and Sr. Mansfield—and accordingly commenced meetings in the Advent Church in this city, on the following Tuesday evening. The meetings that have been held here have been blessed to many. It was apparent at the commencement, from the large attendance, etc., that a deep interest was manifested. We assembled in the morning at ten o'clock, and every evening, and the following Sunday three times; at the close of the meetings we were unable—so large was the attendance—to seat all the people. Many will doubtless never forget the last Saturday night, after Sr. Mansfield had preached.

Br. Mansfield felt it his duty to invite all forward that felt their need of the witness of the Spirit, and a deeper practical experience of religion; many accepted the invitation and came forward. I think I never was in a meeting where there was a greater unanimity of feeling and blessing among the ministerial brethren, believing that it is high time for the church to rise on higher ground, and to contend for the "witness of the Spirit," the "seal of the Holy Spirit of promise," and the "sure confidence once delivered to the saints. God help us to seek the old paths, and walk in them.

Tent Meeting Report—No. 4.

This meeting commenced August 15, and closed the 25th. All that could be done to make the tent attractive, as a place of meeting, was done by the friends. The floor was covered with clean saw dust; it was seated with chairs from the hall, also the stand and platform. Altogether it was a desirable place to spend a social hour, besides being located in the business part of the city. Yet the hearing was small throughout. All who did come observed good order. We slept quietly in the tent alone, save two nights, during our stay Tracts were taken away freely, and one good feature was discernible. that I seldom see elsewhere; that is this, in going about the city I never found where a tract had been torn up, but this I have often found elsewhere. I visited many of the business men, conversed with them freely, and gave them tracts; but their minds seemed as dark as midnight on the teaching of the Bible, and their feelings perfectly averse to obtaining any knowledge of it. The fact is, I never was in a place that was so much under Satanic influence as this city. Gambling, pleasure, whisky, beer and tobacco is the order of the day, and a part of the night. Singers' and Turners' Gardens are visited by thousands on Sunday evenings, cheered by music, and filled with beer, and steeped in tobacco, they seemed to be prepared for any work of the flesh. It is sickening to pass by those slums of vice, and smell the stench of beer and tobacco.

I boarded two blocks from the tent. In going that distance on Sunday morning, I met two loads of beer to supply the slums for the day. I was told that five teams were employed to supply the city with beer, and in passing around one square on Sunday, I saw four places open where billiards and cards were used. Truly, it represents a Sodom.

In visiting business men I often meet with such remarks: "What fools you must be to believe this world will ever end."

The ministers kept away, and their congregations generally. Vital godliness is almost out of the question. The church-going people are small in number, and take more interest in festivals, etc., than in godly edifying. Surely, it may be said to the saints of God in this place as it was said to the church in Sardis. (Rev. 3:4.)

Br. Brockwell was lame and could not help, (only by means), nor yet attend; but himself and wife are heart and hand in the work, so that the great burden of the meeting fell on Br. Marsh, who bore it joyfully and gladly; I may say like Paul, on another occasion, "These were my helpers in the Lord." God bless them.

J. Ridley, Secretary.

P. S.—The camp-meeting was good. There was a good attendance from the surrounding country, also from Manchester. There were many who bore witness to Jesus' power to save, who, years ago, were in the service of Satan. There were five baptized who started during the meeting to serve the Lord; (I baptized four more the Sunday following.) Wanderers were reclaimed and the Lord's people strengthened, and much prejudice removed from the minds of those that had heard of us; but had never heard us before. At our love feast, Sunday morning, seventy testified for Jesus in about twenty minutes, and at the close of the meeting, Sunday evening, over one hundred gathered around the table to commemorate the death of our absent Lord. It was a season long to be remembered, the results of which can only be known in eternity. To the Lord be all the praise.

I see by The Times that small sums are accepted, as well as the large ones, to help lift this debt of the Society. I send one dollar to be applied on the debt. My means are limited at present, or I would gladly make it more. I read The Times with the greatest interest, and love the truth it advocates. It is our weekly preacher. I am not a member of the Church yet, but if God in his providence sees best to place me where I could attend the Advent meetings, there my heart would be also.

From Geo. M. Hutton, Wis.

The Southern Wisconsin camp-meeting, held at Belleville, Wis, has just closed. From first to last our dear Saviour was present. In some of the meetings the foretaste seemed more like the aftertaste; but generally the hours were of a solemn nature, because of the searching times of the Spirit. And we all feel as though the Lord had refined us.

We believe that all the lamps will be brightly burning when Jesus comes. Seven watchmen were there. Seven precious ones are nearing Christ, and are rejoicing in earnest hope. Many others are deeply interested, and we shall hear from them again. With an overflowing heart we praise the matchless name of Christ.

From Wm. Breech, Kentucky.

I must confess that The Times has been a great help to me, to show me in what darkness I have been working for thirty years. By reading The Times and searching the Scriptures, I have been able to learn that I am nothing more than a mortal. God has given me a law and I must keep it; for, if I do not, I must die, but not a death that never dies. I am a member of the Christian Church, sometimes called the Campbellites. I have to fight some hard battles, but the word of the Lord will conquer. We have got a few here who are contending for the faith once delivered to the saints. I am sorry to tell you that I have not got the means to send you now for more tracts, and pay you for The Times, that I have had for the last year; but, if the Lord will, I will send it before my next year is out.

From D. S Morris, West Va.

Although surrounded with embarrassments, I cannot feel easy in my mind without responding to the call for help in relation to the debt that hangs over the Society. I therefore return the blank pledge filled up with the small sum of Four Dollars. I am an old afflicted man—a member of the Baptist Church.

I never can express in human language the light, the peace, the gladness, the holy gratitude, the love to God, awakened in my mind, by the announcement, illustration and defence of gospel truths as found in the writings of Adventists. Oh, how inexpressibly pleasing to the child of God to learn, by a proper understanding of his word, that God does not and will not delight himself in the eternal torment of the wicked, but that he will burn them up. Oh, that every lover of Jesus felt as I feel, and would give as I have given to the blessed cause, and the debt would be paid. Yours in the blessed hope.

From Eld. S. B. Mabry, Iowa.

Br. Sheldon.—I would like to say through the paper, to the friends scattered abroad in regions beyond, that I think (the Lord will), that I shall have time in connection with my labors here during the coming fall and winter week-day evening, and occasionally a Sabbath, in which to help in protracted meetings in destitute places, either in West Illinois or East Iowa, in vicinities where I can reach them readily from this place. As I believe with all my heart that earth's probation is almost over, I feel that I should labor where help is most needed; and I am willing to do all in my power to help sound forth the good news of the soon coming kingdom, and try to tell, by the grace of God, the story of "Jesus and his love" for perishing men.

Will any who need help let us know their condition, and, if we cannot go, we will try and send you some one who can. We shall attend to the demands already upon us as soon as possible. Expect soon to commence a meeting in South Clinton; then one west three miles, near the M. E. Tabernacle, and other places. Meanwhile, let us hear from any in more remote regions, and we will try to arrange accordingly. Pray for us, dear brethren, that the word of God may be duly spoken, from time to time, and become the power of God unto salvation to many precious souls. Our P. O. address is, until further notice, Clinton, Clinton County, Iowa.

Other centers furnished motive power to the lage, mouth, head, &c., or aroused pleasurable emotions or provoked fierce passions. The great centers of motion are collected in the front part of the brain; the nerves, which move the muscles of the jaw, are just over the ears where the phrenologists have placed alimentiveness. Contrary to all their deductions, however, the cerebellum is mainly, if not exclusively, useful in supplying power to the muscles of the eye. It is not phrenology alone which has been illustrated by these experiments. Dr. Ferrier has discovered why large parts of the brain may be diseased without interfering with sanity, and why the slightest inuries to other portions result in epiepsy. He succeeded in the artificial production of epileptic symtoms in a dog, and demonstrated what Dr. H. Jackson had conjectured that epilepsy is occasioned by a lesion between two cerebral convolutions. He was also equally successful in inducing St. Vitus' dance, and in tracing out its material cause.—Cin. Gazette.

Infirmities.

All men have them. Perfect men are scarce; most men have defects which will ruin them unless restrained. Where they are not visible, they often cause pain and fear. Though under cover, they work mischief. Men who have achieved success, have frequently almost failed; and those who have failed have often come near success. One faulty bolt plunges the best of machinery into disorder. Great results hang on trifles. It is surprising how many almost great men there are around us. But one defect makes them failures. A wheel is no stronger than its weakest part. Men are subject to the same general law. Giants become pigmies by having "one soft spot in their heads." If they do a strong thing, they at once destroy it by their folly. Men are like rivers aboundnig in deep water with shallow places. The tonnage is limited by the bars and shallowest water, yet large ships may pass the bars by engineering. Much depends on skill and pluck. Defects do not necessarily work one's ruin. If one knows his weak points, and watchtully guards them, he may escape. But he must build a lighthouse near the breakers and set a guard. It is half the battle to know where the danger lies, and to have the sense and courage to set and maintain the watch. The trouble is that men generally tax the weakest point of their machinery most. An egotist is the last one to suspect danger from too much self reliance. The arrogant man usually glories in his imperial, dictatorial, bluff demeanor. Unruly appetites and passions are often indulged and excused when they should be curbed and brought into subjection. The weak in logic frequently pride themselves on feats of reason; the most dogmatical of men are usually those who should conceal their ignorance with care; those who scarcely have wisdom enough to follow are frequently ambitious to lead, and those who can only ruin are often anxious to be allowed to rule.

A careful and truthful estimate of both our strong and weak points is most essential to the security of success. Then we can avoid temptations which are likely to conquer, avoid responsibilities for which we are not adapted, avoid enterprises for which we are incompetent, and devote our energies to pursuits in which we are likely to succeed. The failures of the past should teach us where our danger lies and how to correct our errors. It is a sad experience to be almost successful in being generous, useful, happy, prosperous, respected, loved, and yet fail from one single fault, one uncontrollable defect of character. At the foot of the cross we should study our faults and dangers, and implore help to overcome. The Spirit will help our infirmities, the power of Christ will make us victors, grace will set the heart right, and that will regulate the life. Then we may glory in our infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon us.—Selected.

Only Believe.

I once saw a lad on the roof of a very high building, where several men were at work. He was gazing about with apparent unconcern, when his foot slipped, and he fell. In falling, he caught a rope, and hung suspended in mid air, where he could sustain himself but a short time. He perfectly knew his situation, and expected to be soon dashed on the stones below. At this moment a kind and powerful man rushed out of the house below, and standing beneath him with extended arms, called out, "Let go the rope; I will receive you." "I can't do it." "Let go the rope and I promise you shall escape unharmed." The boy hesitated for an instant, and then quitting his hold, dropped easily and safely into the arms of his deliverer. Here is a simple act of faith. The poor boy knew his danger; he saw his deliverer, and heard his voice. He believed in him, trusted him, and letting go every other dependence and hope dropped into his arms.

Do you feel that you have done all that you can? Just stop doing, and begin to trust Christ to do it all for you, and you are safe. A man is rowing a boat on a river, just above a dreadful cataract; the current begins to bear him downward; the spectators give him up for lost. "He's gone," they exclaim. But in another moment a rope is thrown toward the wretched man—it strikes the water near the boat. Now how does the case stand? Do all the spectators call upon him to row, to try harder to reach the shore, when each stroke evidently bears him nearer the fall? Oh, no; "Give up your desperate attempt! Take hold of the rope!" But he chooses to row; and in a few moments he disappears and perishes. All his hope lay not in rowing, but in taking hold of the rope; so the sinner's hope lies not in struggling to save himself, but in ceasing to struggle; for while he expects to accomplish the work of salvation himself, he will not look to Christ to do it for him.

But some abuse the doctrine of unmerited grace, and say, "If all I have to do is to cease from trying to save myself, and to be willing that Christ should do the work of salvation, why urge me to be a christian, or to do anything? Why not let me sit still and wait until Christ shall come and pardon me?"

And if that man in the boat had dropped the oars, and then folded his arms, and waited for the rope to save him? He might as well have died rowing as sitting still; and would certainly have died in the latter case. But he must grasp the rope. So the sinner must lay hold on the hope set before him, not by waiting until he is better, but by first concluding that he never will be any better, in the way that he is going on, and then look to Christ.

How to be Miserable.

Never extend to your fellow man, in the hour of need, a helping hand. Sit idly down and allow your thoughts to dwell upon "the might have been." When a friend offends you in word or deed, mope it out in mulish pout. To allow self and all its sensual gratifications to predominate over your better virtues, and mistrust all around you.

Now is this the way to live? Is this the way to pass away the life that has been bestowed on us by our beneficent Creator? Can we, leading such a life as this, prepare for the great beyond? The echo of my heart answers me back, "No, no!"

Then let us be up and doing; let not the golden hours pass unheedingly by. Dwell not too earnestly upon the past; for yesterday we were; to day we are, and to-morrow we hope to be.—Sel.

Our Young Folks.

What is Life?

A little crib beside the bed,
A little face above the spread;
A little frock behind the door,
A little shoe upon the floor,
A little lad with dark brown hair,
A little blue-eyed face, and fair,
A little lane that leads to school,
A little pencil, slate and rule;
A little, blithesome, winsome maid,
A little hand within his laid;
A little cottage, acres four,
A little old time-fashioned store;
A little family gathering round
A little turf-heaped, tear-dewed mound;
A little added to his soil,
A little rest from hardest toil;
A little silver in his hair,
A little stool and easy-chair;
A little night of earth lit gloom,
A little cortege to the tomb.

Kiss me, Mamma.

"Kiss me, mamma, before I sleep." How simple a boon, yet how soothing to the little supplicant is that soft gentle kiss. The little head sinks contentedly on the pillow, for its peace and happiness within. The bright eyes close, and the rosy lips are revealed in the bright and sunny dreams of innocence. Yes, kiss it, mamma, for that good-night kiss will linger in memory when the giver lies mouldering in the grave. The memory of a gentle mother's kiss has cheered many a lonely wanderer's pilgrimage and has been the beacon-light to illuminate his desolate heart; for remember, life has many stormy billows to cross, many a rugged path to climb, with thorns to pierce; and we know not what is in store for the little one so sweetly slumbering with no annoying care to disturb its peaceful dreams. The parched and fevered lip will become dewy again, as recollections bear to the sufferer's couch a mother's love—a mother's kiss. Then kiss your little ones ere they sleep; there is a magic power in that kiss which will endure to the end of life.—Western Recorder.

Brothers and Sisters.

"My brother is as polite to me as any one else, when I go out with him," said a girl proudly to a companion. What a reflection on his manners at home! A sister will, perhaps, accidently knock over some of the tools with which her brother is busy. An apology involuntarily rises to her lips, but she stifles it on considering that it is only Jack; and all the satisfaction he is offered for disordered plans is a blunt "Oh!" Angry reproaches are sure to follow. "You are real ugly, Jack, to talk so about such a thing, you know I didn't mean it," is the equally angry rejoinder. Why did she say so? Two words would have saved all the trouble. Want of politeness is the cause of more quarrelling between brothers and sisters than anything else. In their play, children are constantly meeting with little accidents, for which they should be taught to apologize. I have seen the cheeks of a child flush with anger, his eyes flash, and a little hand raised to strike the unfortunate breaker of the toy, when, as if by magic, the blow was arrested with these words, "Excuse me, I did not mean to."—Sel.

A Cheerful Home.

A SINGLE bitter word may disquiet an entire family for a whole day. One surly glance casts a gloom over the household, while a smile like a gleam of sunshine, may light up the darkest and weariest hours. Like unexpected flowers, which spring up along our path, full of freshness, fragrance, and beauty, so do kind words, and gentle acts, and sweet dispositions, make glad the home where peace and blessing dwell. No matter how humble the abode, if it be thus garnished with grace and sweetened with kindness and smiles, the heart will turn longingly toward it from all tumults of the world, and home, if it be ever so homely, will be the dearest spot beneath the circuit of the sun.

And the influences of home perpetuate themselves. The gentle grace of the mother lives in the daughter long after her head is pillowed in the dust of death, and fatherly kindness finds its echo in the nobility and courtesy of sons who come to wear his mantle and to fill his place: while, on the other hand, from an unhappy, misgoverned and disordered home, go forth persons who shall make other homes miserable, and perpetuate the sourness and sadness, the contentions, and strifes, and railings which have made their own early lives so wretched and distorted.

Toward the cheerful home, the children gather "as clouds and as doves to their windows:" while from the home which is the abode of discontent and strife and trouble, they fly forth as vultures to rend their prey.

The class of men that disturb and disorder and distress the world are not those born and nurtured amid the hallowed influences of Christian homes; but rather those whose early life has been a scene of trouble and vexation—who have started wrong in the pilgrimage, and whose course is one of disaster to themselves, and trouble to those around them.—Friends' Intelligencer.

The Little Girl that Made a Table.

M. L. BOLLES BRANCH.

"Who comes here?" asked Uncle Edward, looking up from his carpenter's bench and plane, as he heard somebody pushing at the door; and when an instant after, a little head with short brown hair showed itself, he said, "Oh, its my little boy, Nan!"

"I ain't a boy!" said Nannie, coming quite in then, and moving her feet restlessly in the sawdust.

"O ho!" said Uncle Edward. "Then what makes you slide down hill, and beg for skates, and fly kites, and have a bag of marbles, and ride the old horse bareback, and borrow my tools?"

"I don't care; I ain't a boy. I'd despise to be!" replied Miss Nannie, hanging a long curly shaving over each ear as she spoke. "Say, Uncle Edward, I want to make a little table.

"Yes, yes!" said the uncle, and he handed it to her.

May I have this little square piece of board?"

"Now, may I take your big gimlet? I want to bore some holes for the legs."

Uncle Edward passed pown the gimlet, and Nannie bored a hole in each of the four corners of the square board. Then she borrowed a knife to whittle out some legs with, and when they were done she hammered them stoutly in. Now the table was done, and it stood as level and firm as anybody's table.

"I'm going now," said Nannie, taking it up. I'm going to give a tea party, and I had my little set of dishes all ready: and Aunt Lizzie let me make some tiny pies and cookies when she was baking this morning, but I didn't have any table to set the things out on, so I thought I would come in here and make one. You may come to my party, if you want to, Uncle Edward."

And of went the little girl, with great satisfaction, to set her table.

"That's a smart one!" said Uncle Edward looking after her as the door shut. "I'd like to see the thing she can't do! I'll warrant her pies and cookies are done to a turn. It's a thrifty little housewife that can cook a meal, and make a table to put it on!"

Then he went back to his planing, while Nannie set her table out on the flat rock under the apple-tree, where the birds sang, and no one in all the world, whether boy or girl, was happier than she.

"HONOR thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Marriages.

SMITH—CUNNINGHAM—Married in Newton, U. Falls, Sept. 17, 1873, by Rev C. Cunningham, Mr. Jonathan C. Smith, (Missionary in Kansas,) to Miss Susie E. Cunningham, of Newton, Mass.

Obituary.

CHANDLER—At the residence of H. C. Wright, Cascade, Iowa, Sept. 7th, Rollen only child of Ruben T. and Alice Wright Chandler, aged six weeks and one day.

"Bud of promise, precious flower,
Thou didst wither in an hour;
Early called to yield thy breath,
Thou art lovely e'n in death."

Crisis please copy. H. E. WRIGHT.

WRIGHT—Peacefully fell asleep in Jesus in Cascade, Iowa, August 29th 1873, Jason Wright, formerly of Connecticut, and consort of Harriet E. Wright; Aged 63 years.

For about ten years he has been a firm believer in the great truth of the coming of Jesus, and its kindred doctrine. He was sprinkled in infancy, but not being satisfied on that point, two years ago, at the Camp meeting in Cascade, though in feeble health with pallid cheek, and form wasting with consumption, he resolved fully to follow his Lord's command, and was buried beneath the liquid waves of the Cascade river.

HODGSON—Died at Avena, Wis., Sept. 22nd, of typhoid fever, Nathan Hodgson, Aged 34 years.

He leaves a numerous circle of friends to mourn his loss, a young wife, three small children, aged parents, brothers and sisters, weep in his absence. We tried to comfort them from these words, "For so he giveth his beloved sleep." Psa. 127-2. PHILO HITCHCOCK.

HOLLISTER—Died in Easton, N. Y., April 11th, Bro. Reuben R. Hollister, Aged 70 years and three months.

He began to serve the Lord in early life, and was a faithful member of the Presbyterian church for many years. In '42 he heard Wm. Miller, and others set forth the doctrine of the near coming of Christ, which he embraced with joy. For 30 years he has been walking in the truth. But he now rests in hope, leaving a devoted wife and three children to morn his loss. May the sweet consolation of God's word and spirit comfort the lonely widow and fatherless children.

J. WILBUR.

CHAMBERS—Died, in Chambersburg, Gallia Co., Ohio, Sept. 18th, 1873, Myrtle, daughter of John and Louisa Chambers, Aged 1 year 6 months and 7 days.

Myrtle was sweet and lovely; but thus have the afflicted parents been called to yield up to the demands of death, their lonely child whose voice always blended with theirs, filling their ear and heart with joy, but while their hearts and home are desolate, they have hope; and our prayer is that as they almost worshiped her on this earth that they may so live that they may meet her again on the new earth, and see her in immortal bloom, where death shall never come.

"And when that bright morn in splendor shall dawn, Death shall be banished, his sceptre be gone,"
Joyfully then shall Myrtle arise,
And friends behold her with unclouded eyes.

Words of comfort by S. P. Whitney, from Jeremiah 31: 15, 16, 17.

Poetry.

Sow the Seed.

Sow with a generous hand;
 Pause not for toil or pain;
Weary not through the heat of summer
 Weary not through the cold spring rain;
But wait till the autumn comes,
 For the sheaves of golden grain.

Scatter the seed, and fear not—
 A table will be spread;
What matter if you are too weary
 To eat your hard-earned bread?
Sow while the earth is broken,
 For the hungry must be fed.

Sow—while the seeds are lying
 In the warm earth's bosom deep,
And your warm tears fall upon it,
 They will stir in their quiet sleep,
And the green blades rise the quicker,
 Perchance, for the tears you weep.

Then sow for the hours are fleeting,
 And the seed must fall to-day,
And care what hands shall reap it,
 Or if you shall have passed away
Before the waving cornfields
 Shall gladden the sunny day.

Sow—and look onward, and upward,
 Where the starry light appears;
Where, in spite of the coward's doubting,
 Of your own hearts trembling fears,
You shall reap in joy the harvest
 You have sown to day in tears.

The Sin Against The Holy Ghost.

BY HORATIUS BONAR, D. D OF SCOTLAND.

"Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme; but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: because they said, He hath an unclean spirit."—Mark 3. 28, 29.

It would serve no purpose to discuss or enumerate the various opinions that have been held respecting this sin. Let us just take the passage itself, and try to find out what the narrative is really meant to teach us.

The key to the passage is contained in the 30th verse,—"Because they said" (were saying), "He hath an unclean spirit." This is the Evangelist's remark for the clearing up of the statement; or rather, I should say, it is the Holy Spirit's own comment on a declaration made specially respecting himself. In the 28th and 29th verses, the Son is speaking of the Spirit, and of the sin against him; in the 30th, the Spirit interprets the words of the Son, and shows that the sin against himself is in reality a sin against the Son. In reading these three verses, in this connection, as spoken successively by the Son of God and the Spirit of God, we see how jealous the one is for the honor of the other. The Holy Spirit will not put upon record this testimony of the Son regarding himself without adding his own testimony to the Son, and showing how sin committed against himself is committed against the Son, and dishonor cast upon himself is dishonor cast upon the Son.

It was in Galilee that these words were spoken; for Jesus was, at this time, "going through every city and village preaching, and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God" (Luke 8: 1). He was opposed, reviled, and threatened, as he went along, teaching and healing. The opposition, however, did not come from the Galileans, but from the Scribes and Pharisees who came down from Jerusalem (Matt. 12: 24; Mark 3: 22). There might be among the inhabitants of that half Gentile region, ignorance and unbelief; but they did not go so far in their malignity as the more intellectual, better educated, and (in the common acceptation of the word) more "religious" citizens of Jerusalem, as represented by their leaders, the Scribes, and Pharisees, and Priests. These, though better read in the Prophets, and professing to be waiting for Messiah, were foremost in the rejection of Christ; setting themselves against himself and his Messiahship with a persevering and desperate malignity, such as we might have reckoned impossible.

Not only did these Jewish leaders shew their unbelief, in Jerusalem and Judea; but they went everywhere, tracking the Lord's footsteps, endeavoring to provoke and entrap him; misrepresenting all that he said and did; maligning him as a wine-bibber and a keeper of the worst company; nay, as possessed of a devil; nay, more, as doing and saying all that he said and did under the influence of this possession. In the present narrative we find them in Galilee, many days' journey from Jerusalem. What were they doing there? They did not come to listen, nor to be taught, nor to be convinced, nor to admire. They had traveled all this distance out of pure malignity. Like demons from hell, they follow the Lord in order to assail him or plot against him. They grudged no toil, no travel, no cost, in order to carry out their hatred to Christ. They watched, with hellish eagerness, every word and motion; misconstruing all his doings; abusing him both for what he did and for what he did not do; and seizing every opportunity for poisoning the minds of the people against him.

In the scene to which our narrative refers, we find him working a miracle; a miracle of no ordinary kind. The case is a very desperate one. The man is both dumb and blind,—perhaps deaf too; and more than this, he is possessed with a devil. He is a signal monument of Satan's power. He is one of Satan's best fortified and best garrisoned fortresses. There could hardly be a clearer or more explicit exhibition of Satan's infernal enmity to man, and of his horrid character as the marrer of God's workmanship, the inflicter of darkness and disease. Seldom had the seed of the serpent been so exhibited in his hatefulness and enmity; and seldom had he been so directly and gloriously confronted with the woman's Seed, in all his loveableness of character and his kindness to man. If ever, therefore, human unbelief were utterly inexcusable, it was here. If ever man's enmity might have been expected to give way, it was here. If ever, in the halting between two opinions, a better choice might have been forced upon man, and even the Pharisee made ashamed of siding against Christ, it is here. God had brought heaven and hell face to face, before man; he had brought the Prince of light and the prince of darkness into close and direct collision; and that in circumstances most likely to enlist man's sympathies with heaven against hell, with the Son of God against the devil and his angels. It might have been expected that man would, at least for once, have taken the side of God; and that the Scribes and Pharisees, the most enlightened and best educated of the land, would have given way in their prejudice and hatred. But it is just here that the greatness of their hostility comes out; and as afterwards the cry arose in Jerusalem, "Not this man, but Barabbas," so here, in Galilee, a like cry is heard, from the lips of the same men, "Not the Holy Spirit, but the devil!"

Thus it was that these Scribes and Pharisees sinned against the Holy Spirit, by imputing to the devil the works of Christ, which he did by the power of the Holy Ghost in him. They did not do this in ignorance; for they were not half-enlightened Galileans, but men well-read in their Scriptures; they did it knowingly. They did not do it hastily, and under the influence of passing excitement; they did it deliberately, and resolutely, and continuously. They did it with their eyes open; they did it maliciously, in the desperate hatred of their hearts. They did it without one extenuating circumstance,—without anything either to excuse or to account for their malignity. This is the sin which our Lord here declares to be unpardonable. To have said that this marvelous universe was created by the devil, and not by God, would have been a kindred crime; a sin of awful daring. To have said that the miracles of Egypt, the dividing of the Red Sea, the manna, the water, the healing of the serpents' deadly bite, the drying up of Jordan, the overthrow of Jericho, the arrest of sun and moon in Gibeon, were all the work of the devil, would have been sins like in kind to this of the Pharisees; but not, by many degrees, equal to it in dark malignity. For, in this miracle of Christ, thus misinterpreted, we have more of divine love and power,—more of God himself, than in all these other miracles together. One of the fullest and brightest manifestations of God's character, as our loving, healing, pardoning, redeeming God, is in this miracle; and hence the particularly aggravated guilt of those who reviled it as the work of the devil. It was a work done by the special power of the Holy Ghost,—a work in which might have been clearly read the Father's love and power, the Son's love and power, the Spirit's love and power. Yet this work of the Holy Spirit, this miracle of Godhead's love and power, is ascribed to Satan! It was calling God the devil, and the devil God; it was calling hell heaven, and heaven hell. It was not mere rejection of Christ; it was not mere disbelief of his miracles; it was not mere refusal of the divine testimony to his Messiahship. It was something beyond all these phases of unbelief. It was the substitution and preference of the evil for the good, of the darkness for the light, of the seed of the serpent for the Seed of the woman. Nay, more, it was the deliberate declaration, not that the works of God the Holy Ghost were unreal and untrue,—but that they were not his works at all, but those of the devil. It was the admission of their reality, but the ascription of them to the devil. It was carrying out the hatred of Christ to such an extreme as to be willing to acknowledge Satan as the worker of miracles rather than Christ; nay, it was so hating the Holy Spirit, because of his thus witnessing for Christ, as to call him "an unclean spirit," Beelzebub, the prince of devils!

Such is the sin against the Holy Ghost; a sin which originates in very peculiar circumstances; which can only be committed by those who sin wilfully, daringly, and maliciously; and which, in all probability, could only be committed when the Lord was upon the earth, working miracles by the power of the Spirit.

It is worthy of notice, that our Lord does not affirm that even these blasphemous Pharisees had actually committed the sin. The awful words regarding the sin that has no pardon are spoken as words of warning. In them the Lord is pointing to the horrible gulf which these Pharisees were approaching, and warning them off. He sees them like a vessel drawing nearer some raging whirlpool, and he speaks that they may be alarmed and turn back. In this there is a blessed mixture of grace and righteousness. He would warn even the Pharisees! He would sound the alarm even to those who were on the very point of plunging into hell!

The sin is thus a peculiar sin. It is not the same as rejection of Christ and final unbelief. It is not even blasphemy against Christ and his work. It is not simply sin against light and knowledge. It is not repeated, nor prolonged, nor outrageous backsliding. It is something special; something open and before others; it is something deliberate and malicious; it is something which would render the man's state quite hopeless, and seal his doom at once. It is something connected directly with the Spirit, and which involves daring blasphemy against him and his doings. It must, then, be a greater sin than that of Judas, for his sin was pardonable to the last. It must be a greater sin than scourging, buffeting, reviling, crucifying the Lord of glory. Oh, how unutterably hateful must that sin be, of which we thus read, "Wherefore I say unto you, All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall never be forgiven him. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall never be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come. He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation; BECAUSE THEY SAID, HE HATH AN UNCLEAN SPIRIT!"

But, while this sin is a very peculiar one, and, possibly, only committed when our Lord was here, and that by those who ascribe to the devil the miracles which Christ did, by the Holy Ghost, there are approximations to it, in all ages, of which men need to be warned. The way in which many attack revivals, and revile those engaged in them, and ascribe the conversions to mere excitement, or hypocrisy, or love of show, or to Satan himself, is a perilous approach to blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Let men beware how they speak of those religious awakenings. If you dislike them, or see no evidence for their genuineness, at least let them alone. Especially let those who, in their zeal for ecclesiastical order, have set themselves against such movements, and do not hesitate to throw out insinuations as to all these being the devil's work, beware lest they be found fighting against God, and reviling the Spirit of God. They may be nearer the sin of the Pharisees than they are willing to think; and their zeal for sound words, in which they pride themselves, only helps to identify them the more with these haters of the Lord. The dislike of sudden conversions looks very like a denial of the Spirit's work; just as the dislike of assurance looks like a questioning of the work of Christ,—a denial of its sufficiency to give immediate peace to the awakened conscience. Let the ungodly beware of scoffing at revivals; and let professing Christians beware of standing aloof from them, as if they were fanaticism, or excitement, or the work of Satan.

Physiology of Preaching.

Husband all your strength for the delivery of your sermon. Take not a step, sing not a line, speak not a word unnecessarily; for we arise in the morning with a certain amount of physical power, and acquire but little power during the day from other sources. It is the recuperation which it gives, and if that force be expended in a long walk or ride to church, or in any muscular effort whatever, you have just that much less for the sermon, and every clergyman must know that the more physical vigor he has, the easier he can preach. Singing is an effort; hence every verse sung is a loss of vocal power.

Be more of a man than to be the slave of a sip of water, a lozenge, or a lump of sugar, before or during preaching; the necessity of these grows upon a man with great rapidity, and detracts from his independence and self reliance.

Avoid conversation from the time of rising in the morning until the sermon is delivered; for the more your subject absorbs your whole being, the greater will be the unction with which the message is delivered. Begin in a low tone, but with the utmost distinctness of utterance; and as the lungs grow warm and the vocal organs more pliable, throw in more voice gradually, until the end of the discourse; otherwise you will break down before you are half through.

Never study a gesture or an intonation; this involves a mental diversion from the subject, and impairs your force.—Vermont Chronicle.

Be in Earnest.

"Do you think I believe what you say of my danger;" asked a young man of one who urged him to seek at once his soul's salvation. "I have a brother who is a minister, and two sisters who are professors of religion, and they never told me of it. No, indeed, and I am sure they would not." So he sheltered himself behind his friends inconsistency, and went on in hardness of heart.

Even the good Mr. Simeon received this rebuke from a dying relative: You never warned me of the great danger I was in, of neglecting my soul's salvation." "Nay my brother, but I took every reasonable opportunity of bringing the subject of religion before you, and frequently alluded to it in my letters." "Yes," said the dying man, "but you never came to me, closed the door, and took me by the collar of the coat, and told me I was unconverted, and if I died in that state, I was lost. Now I am dying, and but for God's grace I might have been forever undone."—Selected.

Man's Present State; and its bearing on his future destiny.

E. ROYCE.

There is one thing in particular which the reader of an article on a religious subject generally desires to know at the commencement, and that is, what the writer wishes or intends to prove. But I trust he will forgive me when I inform him that in the present case he will be obliged to read it in order to have his wish gratified. For I have not, as is too often the case, adopted a belief at a venture, and then made an effort to force the Bible to prove it true, but first go to God's laws, written and unwritten to get a sure foundation on which to build, and having done so, proceed to reason logically on, and draw conclusions from it, irrespective of my own former views, or those of others.

It was once said by a noted writer (Thomas Paine,) "We can know God only through his works." This is true, though it may not prove what its author intended, for his written word, when made free from interpolations and mutilations, is as much a part of his works as are the laws of nature. Both must be perfect, as they are the handiwork of a perfect Being, and for the same reason they must agree. Therefore, wherever there is an apparent conflict between them, we must give precedence to the teaching of his unwritten—his natural laws because they are, and ever have been beyond the control and power of man to alter, consequently are to-day as perfect as when first established; while his written word, as all do, or may know, has been somewhat mutilated, either intentionally, or by accident, in the various translations through which it has passed, in the hands of men. And this is not all. The idiom of the languages in which the scriptures were written is different in many essential respects from ours, and having been retained without explanation in our translation, has proved the basis of gross errors in belief, on the future destiny of the race, especially that large portion included in the scriptural term "the unjust." And this is, in fact, the real source of all disbelief in the Bible, for it represents the Creator of all things as possessing attributes entirely at variance with the character of an all-wise, benevolent, and perfect Being.

It is the object of this article to present this subject before the reader in its true light, as far as space will permit. And the writer earnestly hopes that prejudices caused by wrong education are not so deep-seated as to prevent his seeing its truthfulness, and harmony with the real character of our Maker, and his beloved Son, our Lord and Saviour. In investigating this important question, one primary fact must be understood at the outset, namely: that nothing in the universe came by chance, but all things that are, were produced by, or in harmony with, fixed laws ordained for the purpose. And that one of the most important of these, the one in fact which underlies all others, and without which neither vegetable nor animal can exist, is the law of electricity as developed by the connected poles of an electric battery. That is, a positive and negative power brought into contact, and thereby producing a result.

Were the inquiry made what God first created, the reply might be, as it often is, the heavens and the earth. But this is a mistake. It is true the matter, in a chaotic state, from which they were to be formed was, so far as they are concerned, "in the beginning," created. But that was not the first act of creative power. For we learn from scripture, (Rev. 3:14,) that the "faithful Witness," the Logos, or Word, was "the beginning of the creation of God." In proof of this, John, at the commencement of his Gospel, says: "In the beginning (i. e. before matter was created) was the Word, (i. e. in existence) and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." In other words, the Word was God's instrumental power. That is, his will or commands were manifested through the Word. Hence, John says in continuation: "All things were made by him," &c. God's Word is his position, and his Spirit is his negative power. That is, these are his instrumentalities by which all things were made. But like the poles of a battery they are inoperative alone. The Word can accomplish nothing without the aid of the Spirit; nor can the Spirit accomplish anything unaided by the Word. But when connected they produce the desired result. Hence it is truly said, the Spirit and Word agree; i. e. act in harmony.

Their first work, so far as we have any account, was to form the light by separating it from the darkness, and thus establishing the two etherial poles. Now we knew that neither animals nor vegetables could live for any great length of time either in pure light or gross darkness; but a combination of both produces the medium desired. So also, when they separated the water from the land they established the two material poles, and a combination is indispensable in order to produce vegetation. Every organic body also whether it be animal, or vegetable, is formed, and its germ or spirit-life is quickened to activity by this law. In the vegetable kingdom the seed, of whatever kind it may be, is the positive, and the earth its negative pole. The seed cannot produce alone, neither can the earth, but when brought in contact, a body after the form and nature of the one sown is the result. The same rule holds good in the propagation of all animals. The sexes are the two opposite poles, and when the fœtus is quickened in the womb of the female, a death transpires corresponding to the death of grain sown in the womb of earth, and in both cases alike the elementary parts of a new body commence their formation.

By this law also we learn the meaning of the scriptural declaration that God created evil. The primary use of this term in scripture is not to define the quality of a thing of itself, but to express a distinction between it and something better. There are no defining terms of comparison used in scripture, but every thing is in harmony with this law expressed in the superlative, while as before shown it is graded in the comparative degree. That is, as neither extreme can produce any result without the aid of its opposite, so there could be no good unless there was something of an inferior quality of a similar kind. And those two qualities, without regard to their similarity in other respects, are scripturally termed good and evil. So the whole creative work of God was, in the abstract, "very good," no matter what its kind or quality was; yet between the different qualities of any kind, the poorer was evil, the better, good. And thus at the beginning, by causing different qualities of matter to exist, God created good and evil. As a further illustration of this subject we will take the superlative terms, love and hate, as used in scripture. There are two twin brothers mentioned, both of whom were, as the record shows, beloved by their Creator; yet because the older for a special cause was preferred or chosen to a particular work, it is written "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated." This gives the true interpretation of scripture language where superlatives are used. Hence, when Jesus would teach his disciples the important truth that they must love him more than their earthly friends, he told them in order to do so they must "hate" father and mother, wife and children, &c. And this fact, so clearly illustrated, gives the key to a correct understanding of the term "cursed," out of which a theological belief has been manufactured by man and charged to Divinity, which would be a disgrace to any earthly Potentate. And now having made this charge against a popular dogma, I will briefly prove it, and then proceed with my subject. This system teaches, first, that God is more powerful and wise than any other being, which is strictly true. Second, that he made man intending he should remain in Eden as his subject forever; but the devil, acting through the serpent, so beguiled him that he completely upset God's plan; which if true shows an imperfection or oversight in the Divine arrangement, else it could not have been accomplished. Third, God was so exasperated about it that he brought a withering curse on man's innocent posterity, and not on them alone, but on all beasts of the field, fowls of the air, and fish in the sea, and the earth also. Now I am sure every candid reader will admit that it would be not only a disgrace but an unmitigated act of tyranny, for any earthly ruler to inflict punishment on his subjects for the acts of others over whom they had no control. Fourth, that he gave his Son as a "substitute" to bear the penalty which was justly due the race for violating his laws, thus frustrating the object for which they were made. And what earthly ruler would do that? Would it be a mark of wisdom with our legislature to enact laws for the regulation of society and punishment of crime, and then attach a proviso by which the guilty party might atone for their crime by substituting some innocent person to suffer in their stead? What would such laws be worth? Corrupt men might make such laws truly for evil purposes, but not so with Jehovah. The penalty of all his laws, both physical and moral will, to their full extent, be visited on the heads of those who violate them. For he is no respecter of persons.

Litch's Offer.

A. ARMOUR.

It is not a reward of one thousand dollars, or a three hundred dollar horse, to find the words "immortal soul" or "deathless spirit" in the Bible; but it is, if materialists will produce one text from the New Testament which teaches the doctrine of the utter unconscious state of the dead, he, J. L., will accept it. His letter presents three points for our consideration:

1. The subjects of our inquiry,—"the dead."

2. Their state—"utter unconsciousness," or not.

3. The witnesses to whom we are restricted for proof—"Christ and his apostles," in "the New Testament."

Let us then notice, first, the subjects of our inquiry: They are "the dead." Surely Br. L. uses the word in a Bible, or at least in a New Testament sense. He knows, perhaps, that the New Testament word, nekros, translated "the dead," means "a dead body, a corpse." Does he ask proof of the utter unconscious state of corpses? When I have quoted from Eccl. 9:5, "the dead know not anything," the comment by immaterialists used to be: "The dead body, you know; the soul is an immortal thing, it cannot die, and therefore it is not intended to be represented by the terms, "the dead." Does Br. L. mean to represent an undying part of man by the words, "the dead?" Are we to produce proof of the utter unconscious state of dead deathless spirits? Will Br. L. produce one passage in the New, or Old Testament, where the disembodied spirit or soul is called "dead?" If he will, it might not be hard to prove the dead spirit "utterly unconscious."

Secondly, we consider the state of the dead bodies, or dead spirits, and we find that neither the word "unconscious," nor the word "conscious" occurs in the English Bible. Can Br. L. find New Testament or Bible words to express the idea? If he does, he will ask us to prove a doctrine something like this, "the dead know not anything."

Lastly, we come to the witnesses, "Christ and his apostles, who were the true teachers of Christian doctrine." And "If any man preach any other gospel....let him be accursed." Hear Jesus: "Search the scriptures," (John 5:39)—search the Old Testament scriptures! "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." Hear Paul: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine." Who is "accursed," those who obey Christ and his apostles, or those who lay aside the Old Testament scriptures?

But this is not producing a New Testament text which teaches the utter unconscious state of the dead. Br. L. may find such a one in John 11:11: "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth." Jesus spake of his death. He says death is a sleep; sleep is a state of utter unconsciousness; therefore the dead are utterly unconscious.

Granting that in sleep we dream, yet we are not conscious in dreaming; we do not perceive the realities with which we are surrounded; we dream we are young and strong, when old and feeble; we dream we are where we are not; we are utterly unconscious. True, also, we are capable of being awakened—so are the dead; but this no more proves consciousness in sleep than the capability of eating in a hungry man proves that he is filled.

If Br. L. wishes to explain himself, perhaps the Editor will grant him a reasonable space in THE TIMES. His position, so far as I can judge, is this: "The dead are, perhaps, unconscious—but not utterly so;" and he seems to have some misgivings that the Old Testament would furnish positive proof that they are truly in an utter unconscious state!

If he is really so far advanced in materialism as to call the conscious part of man "dead," and only needs proof of its utter unconsciousness, we will expect him to declare himself a "soul-sleeper" very soon.

What I Heard.

O. D. GIBSON.

I attended a meeting a few days since, to hear a so-called Divine attempt to prove the immortality of the soul of man. In the course of his speech, he declaimed like this: "My friends, the spirits of our friends, who were once here on earth, are now all around us; yes, my friends, the air is full of them." And yet, but a little before this he had taught us that at death these same spirits went to heaven, if good; but, if bad, went down to hell;—proof, rich man and Lazarus. "It could not have been their bodies," said he, "for they were dead and buried; hence, it must have been their spirits."

Query—If these spirits go at death to these two different localities, how came they back here so thick as to have the "air full of them?" Surely, if the spirits of the wicked are here in the air, they are not in the same condition the rich man was for he was "tormented in this flame." Now we are not in a "flame," and they being in the same air, cannot be in a "flame" either; so there must be a mistake somewhere. Again: if the spirits of our friends are around us, they are of both classes, so that they must have come from both sides of that "impassable gulf," by which means they have got together, either by crossing it, or playing a flank movement around it, and thus outwitted Abraham, who said such could not get together from either side, nor go from thence to where the rich man's brethren were, except "one rose from the dead." And surely they will not claim that a spirit could rise from the dead, for that would be an admission that the spirit dies; for that cannot rise from the dead, which is alive. So I see no way to get along with this matter but to conclude there is a mistake; that dead men's spirits are not all around us in the air, or else they have taken the wrong Scriptures to prove it by. That must be a large prison, or hell, in which to confine spirits, if they range the region of space filled with air. In fact, their sphere of action is enlarged since death, for, when "in this body pent," their sphere was quite limited, but now bounded alone by space. So, instead of being imprisoned at death, they were let out of prison, or at least have liberty of the prison yard, which is very extensive. Oh, what a bottomless pit this spiritism is! Imagination, when you once enter it, will let loose her flood-gates and whirl you on and on—you know not whither—for you have no measurements or guide, nor sounding-line that can reach bottom; neither can you reach shore; though you fancy you see land, it is only spirit land; you go toward it; it is only illusion, unreal, imaginary. God deliver us and give the true hope of the gospel of eternal life by a resurrection from the dead to immortality.

The Word and Spirit.

S. JUDSON.

The Bible, as a revelation of God's will and purposes of mercy to the race of man, is a blessed Book, full of instruction and promises. But men have undertaken to make improvements, and almost spoiled it by giving different interpretations from that designed. So God has raised up man to dig out the truth, and to give it in its primitive state. God has blessed them in that work, and now by putting on the gospel glasses, they can make it a common sense Book, without one truth clashing with another. Those that receive the light in the love of it will secure eternal life. The road that leads there is very streaight and narrow. If we get switched off on some other road—the directions are returned: the more we persevere in doing wrong, the further becomes the distance. The Bible says "return unto me and I will return unto you."

We fear that some who have started in the narrow way have switched off, set up separate interests, and lost the way, leaving their first love.

What an admonition to us all. Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. We as Adventists need to be cautious not to settle down to a correct theory in the head without love in the heart. If love be lacking there will be failure in the end. When Jesus comes, we shall go with the object we love most, where the attraction is the strongest. Solemn thought: "who shall abide the day of His coming; God is the book-keeper, and will keep his books posted without error; "He that loveth father and mother more than me is not worthy of one;" and Peter says: "If ye do these things ye shall never fall." So a through ticket is secured. But these promises are conditional; we are to obtain the promise. Jesus Christ is coming soon to recieve His bride. A very serious thought arises, what will be the character of those accounted worthy? We are not left in the dark: none but the holy and the pure will enter in. The ornaments necessary are described; among others, a meek and quiet spirit is approved. If we give no heed to comply with the requirements, will not that prove a fatal objection to being chosen?

When Jesus comes, it will be too late to rectify mistakes: "He that is filthy will remain filthy, and he that is holy will remain holy." The right kind of faith produces the right kind of work. To do the work in these last days, requires strong faith. We want the right kind of impliments to work with. The Bible will be a dead letter unless we have the spirit to apply it, giving an edge. The test of discipleship is in having the spirit, and we are cautioned not to "grieve the Holy Spirit of God whereby we are sealed until the day of redemption." Again, we are said to be "the temples of the Holy Ghost;" "if we defile His temple, He will destroy us. It seems that the Spirit of God will not stay if the temple is defiled. Will not the use of tobacco have that effect? If we get the breath that comes from it, I think there must be some defilement beyond that. I have had some experience, having used it for twenty five or thirty years. It is about that length of time since I broke from the habit which was a very strong one. When I went from home, I did not like to leave my company behind: but I became convinced that it was wicked for me to continue its use, so I took it to the Lord in prayer, and the Lord helped me out of my filthy habit. He gave me the will, I found the way, thanks be to the Lord I was made free, and got a full discharge.

To my Advent brethren in the Lord, I want to ask one question: When the Master comes will he say well done, in that direction?

Praise.

R. WILLET.

The Sweet Singer of Israel, throughout his Psalms speaks a great deal about praising the Lord in various ways, and by various means, or instruments of music. And in summing up, in the last, or 150th Psalm, he calls on "everything that hath breath" to praise the Lord. Some of the Psalms seem to be scarcely anything but praise (see 136th Psalm.) David said it was a good thing to praise the Lord, and good to sing praises unto our God, and pleasant. And again he says, he will praise him "while he has any being." Thus in his psalms, from beginning to end, it is praise and thanksgiving. And it is not only David who praises the Lord, but we hear Job uttering praise in all his afflictions, thus: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Also the other prophets, and Christ his disciples. Hear Peter, Paul, Silas, and others praising the Lord. Praise being so conspicuous a theme in the Bible, and so much inculcated and recommended to all, surely we should try to understand it, so that in trying to follow in the path of the just, we too may be able to praise and sing with the Spirit and understanding, and make melody in our hearts, as well as with our voices, or instruments of music. The question arises, What is true praise to God? I find that the utterances of praise on the part of David were the result of a contemplation of God, and his attributes, in connection with his wonderful works toward the children of men. And also by keeping in view the tender mercy of God, was he especially prompted to praise. Hence the expression, "Praise ye the Lord, for his mercy endureth forever;" and this declaration repeated again, and again, seems to be a keynote to many of the inspired melodies. A correct conclusion to be drawn from the inspired testimony I believe is this: that to sound forth, or to give the Lord true praise, it is very necessary to study his word and contemplate his works. And when we can realize the fact that the tender mercy of the God is over all his works, and that the testimony of his word is love to the children of men, then we can begin to catch some of the melodious strains contained in the Book of praise. And as we advance, keeping in mind the key note, "God is love," we begin to edify ourselves and others by the rehearsal of the sweet melodies reverberating all through the different parts of God's written music, given us to learn. Ah, who that has once caught the spirit of the heavenly strain, wafted down to us by the ages, as uttered by angelic lips on Bethlehem's plain, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men," can forget their Lord? Who that has received the testimony of the word in regard to the true condition of man without a Saviour, but can appreciate the labor of love, and weep tears of sorrow and joy over the sad, sweet story of the cross. But if man be taught by man or devil that he is equal to God as to extent of future being by virtue of his nature, how can he properly appreciate the declaration falling from the Saviour's lips, that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." In view of this declaration, can we not with David say, "Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord." I understand by the wording of the Psalmist a possibility of compliance or there would not be an exhortation: and also that the sentence implies a conditional command, "let every thing praise the Lord;" that is, if there be a willingness, then praise the Lord. And also in the light of prophecy, that all things would praise the Lord finally. Let us hear the Revelator: And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, hear I saying, Blessing and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him, that sittith upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. And the four beasts said Amen." (Rev. 5.) Fellow mortal, can you not also say amen, to the precious promise of God's word, that there will be a time of blessing and praise, instead of cursing? when the Devil and his works shall all be destroyed? (Heb. 2–14 and 1 John 5–8). "Praise ye the Lord."

The State of the dead.

HATTIE WEED.

In all matters pertaining to a worldly character, we as rational beings should exercise our judgment and discretion, in order that we may discern the right from the wrong—the real from the false: If worldly matters are of so much importance which soon vanish away, and are gone forever, who can estimate the value of spiritual things which last through all time and eternity? How necessary it is that right views may be formed upon the subject which is of so great importance. Everything which tends to make men happier and better is worthy of earnest thought and careful consideration. The Bible, God's best gift to man, was intended to be a guide to his feet and a lamp to his path; to show him his duty to his maker, his fellow mortals, and himself; to lead him by its teachings through this weary world, on to the promised home beyond. Without it the christian would be tossed about like a ship without a rudder, with no knowledge of his future destiny. Sacred writing, as well as profane, has its readers who differ in opinion relating to the truths brought before them. One great truth brought before us in the Bible relating to "The state of the dead" is met with such a diversity of opinions that it seems hardly possible to be settled in our own minds on this subject. In order that it may be fully understood, a careful perusal of the holy scriptures, and an excersise of all our reasoning powers, is necessary. It has long been a query in my mind why it was that a judgment was necessary if all receive their reward at death? And why is it that christians fear to die, if death is the gate to endless joy? Why is it that they recoil with a shudder from crossing the dark river which leads them at once into paradise? And when they get there, how is it possible for them to be happy when they can look down on this earth and witness the sufferings of those near and dear to them? It is simply impossible. The Bible does not advocate any such doctrine. It must be plain to all persons of sound judgment that "the dead know not anything" for it is so declared in the divine Word. They sleep their last sleep till the last tramp shall sound, which shall arouse them to a new being.

Let us be thankful for the light that we have, and pray that others may be brought to a knowledge of the truth.

Commendable.

C. C. M.

The Bible is the Book of books. It is justly worthy of the pre-eminence over all other books. It deserves a place at the head of every man's business. And he, who with pure motives carries the Scriptures into his daily avocation, may expect heaven's grace upon the work of his hands. Still the rich, the great, and the monopolizers of this fast age pay but little heed to this blessed book. They pass it by with indifference or treat it with scorn. I was most happily surprised the other day on entering the cars on the Galena division of the C. & N. W. R. to find books distributed in beautiful racks within reaching distance of the passengers, with these words printed on the side, "The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." What, thought I, is Jesus Christ recognized as a Saviour here? Railroad hands are usually profaners of that name. Fearing I might be mistaken and humbugged by the superscription, I took the book from its quiet resting place, and opening to the 19th chapter of Luke I read carefully the whole chapter. There is no mistake. It is the blessed book it professes to be. It seemed to me that chapter had a beauty in it I had never seen before. The coloquy with Zaccheus, the parable of ten pieces of money, Jesus riding into Jerusalem on a colt while the people exclaimed, "Blessed be the king that cometh in the name of the Lord;" and stopping on the brow of Olivet the compassionate Master weeps over the desolate and forsaken city.

I asked a brakeman sitting near what this meant, and who this book was put here to benefit. "The passengers," was the prompt reply. "The company has put them on all day trains for the accommodation of the traveling public." Well, thought I, it's commendable, to say the least. This is by no means an argument in favor of the Whitbyan theory of Millennium. Placing Bibles on passenger trains will never convert the world. But perhaps some one or two or more may be converted by this means and saved in the kingdom. What a grand enterprise!

The Spirit of Christianity.

JAMES A. NEWTON.

I am glad that there is a christianity in the world, by which all enlightened followers of Christ are cemented by a definite unbroken bond. That there are none others, who will finally attain to a crown of life in the final issue, we do not even intimate. But, that spirit of Him who came into the world to save makes his people one it cannot be denied. Oh, what a cheering thought is this to the minister of Christ, who teaches and preaches a christianity which commends itself to all mankind. And again, to the laity this is a boon of heavenly love, that his people are one in the spirit of Christ Jesus our Lord. Among the numerous creeds of christian faith, the faithful soldier finds no jar of sentiment in duty. Here we are one in brotherly love.

These sentiments and this spirit are sustained by the Great Teacher, and they are in harmony one with another, conferring a blessing to mankind, giving a joy only emanating from God its author. Our items of difference in Bible interpretation, never should create a feeling of animosity in the believer's mind. When we refuse to accord to others the liberty we wish to enjoy ourselves, we are both blind and bigoted. In the strength of Israel's God and the covenant of his grace may we stand forth before mankind untrammelled and unfettered by these allurements of him who would rejoice with the ungodly in an unprofitable and wicked controversy.

So charming is the spirit of christianity that even its bitterest enemies are vanquished by its influence. I love a friend and brother in Christ Jesus, 'who walks not after the flesh,' whether he be African, Swede, or American, king or peasant. There is nothing so pleasing to the faithful as to meet and greet a sacrificing friend of God and his church. And now, O, let this spirit characterize us, dearly beloved, and crowns and palms shall be given us at his coming and kingdom.

Some Excellent Thoughts.

VIRGIL HUNT.

A few good thoughts were brought out by a Presbyterian minister from the following words: "Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do then with Jesus who is called Christ?" (Mat. 27: 22.) He went on to say that all other questions, when compared to this, fell into insignificance. And as he proceeded I thought truly what a great and important question this is: "What shall I do then with Jesus?" And my mind ran back to the context, where Judas sold Jesus for thirty pieces of silver, and then the result which followed: "He departed and hanged himself."

And thus we see the fearful result of bartering our interest in the Son of God. But have we not sold Jesus cheaper still? Have we not sold him for earthly pleasures? Have not some of us sold him for the ball room—others for the pleasure of running horses—some for a game of billiards—a glass of liquor? Let us think how easily it is to sell the Lamb of God. I do not wonder when Pilate saw the miserable fall of Judas, that the question came home to his heart in thunder-tones, "What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ?" Our brother well said, "the question is in the singular (not plural)." Then the question comes home to each of us, separately, "What shall we do with Jesus?" When he comes in his glory with all the holy angels, may God grant that writer and reader may have acceptance of him.

The Bible Grows with One.

If you come to Holy Scripture with growth in grace, and with aspirations for yet higher attainments, the book grows with you, grows upon you. It is even beyond you, and cheerily cries: 'Higher yet: Excelsior!" Many books in my library are now behind and beneath me; I read them years ago, with considerable pleasure; I have read them since with disappointment; I shall never read them again, for they are of no service to me. They were good in their way once, and so were the clothes I wore when I was ten years old; but I have outgrown them—I know more than these books know, and I know wherein they are faulty. Nobody ever outgrows Scripture; the book widens and deepens with our years. It is true, it cannot really grow, for it is perfect; but it does so to our apprehension. The deeper you dig into Scripture, the more you find that it is a great abyss of truth. The beginner learns four or five points of orthodoxy, and says: "I understand the gospel, I have grasped all the Bible." Wait a bit, and when his soul grows and knows more of Christ, he will confess; "Thy commandment is exceeding broad—I have only begun to understand it."—Spurgeon.

THERE is dew in one flower and not in another, because one opens its cup and takes it, while the other closes itself, and the drop runs off. So God rains goodness and mercy as wide as the dew, and if we lack them it is because we will not open our hearts to receive him.

IN temporal danger seek spiritual security.

The Christian Life.

Have Faith in God.

There's a fullness in God's mercy,
  Like the fullness of the sea;
There's a kindness in His justice
  Which is more than liberty.

There's no place where earthly sorrows,
  Are more felt than up in heaven;
There's no place where earthly failings
  Have such kindly judgment given.

For the love of God is broader
  Than the treasure of man's mind;
And the heart of the Eternal
  Is most wonderfully kind.

But we make his love too narrow
  By false limits of our own;
And we magnify his strictness
  With a zeal we will not own.

Pining souls, come nearer Jesus;
  Come, but come not doubting thus:
Come with faith that trusts more freely
  His great tenderness for us.

If our love were but more simple,
  We should take him at his word;
And our lives would be all sunshine
  In the sweetness of our Lord.

Worldliness.

How vain the attempt to reconcile worldliness and spirituality!—to harmonize the service of mammon and of God! They who make the attempt, forget the character of the age and the course of the world in which they live. They forget that Jew and Gentile, having joined in the rejection and crucifixion of Him whom God sent to be the Saviour of the lost, the world lies under the guilt of that daring act of consummated wickedness.

Think you that God will not avenge the act? Think you that the sentence will not be executed—"Now is the judgment of this world"? They who do not receive this world, and who do not believe that the present is a period of God's long-suffering, and that a day is approaching in which the vials of His wrath will be poured out on an unrepentant and ungodly world, must read their Bibles with little intelligence. It is expressly declared that at the end of the present age, "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed in flaming fire (2 Thes. 1); and that, as when "Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all; even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." (Luke 17.) The executioners of judgment, it is written, "will gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity." (Matt. 13: 41.) And again—"The Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." (Isa. 26: 21.) Such is the crisis to which we are hastening!

And if we are "delivered from this present evil world" (Gal. 1: 4), by the hand of omnipotent grace, and are brought into fellowship with God's Son, as "joint-heirs" with him in glory, what line of conduct becomes us while on our way to our heavenly inheritance? Are we to form an alliance with a world that is stained with the blood of God's Son? Are we to forget that "whosoever will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God"? (James 4: 4.)

Blessed JESUS! oh, that our eyes were anointed with the heavenly eye-salve, that we might behold THEE in thine excellency! Then would the rays of thy glory, lingering on our eye balls dim our vision for other things. Reveal thyself, then, to our eye of faith, as thou didst of old to thy martyr Stephen, to the eye of sense. Wean our unfaithful hearts from earthly things. Extricate our hands from the entanglement of the world, and break every bond that hinders from self-surrender, and consecration to thy services. Give us more earnestness in seeking to rescue sinners from impending judgment, and keep us waiting and watching for the dawn of that long-expected day, when we shall see thee as thou art, be transformed into thine image, and be with thee for ever!—Dublin Tract.

SALVATION'S robe is not patchwork, partly Christ's righteousness, and partly ours. Christ is all.

in having the spirit, and we are cautioned not to "grieve the Holy Spirit of God whereby we are sealed until the day of redemption." Again, we are said to be "the temples of the Holy Ghost;" "if we defile His temple, He will destroy us. It seems that the Spirit of God will not stay if the temple is defiled. Will not the use of tobacco have that effect? If we get the breath that comes from it, I think there must be some defilement beyond that. I have had some experience, having used it for twenty-five or thirty years. It is about that length of time since I broke from the habit which was a very strong one. When I went from home, I did not like to leave my company behind: but I became convinced that it was wicked for me to continue its use, so I took it to the Lord in prayer, and the Lord helped me out of my filthy habit. He gave me the will, I found the way, thanks be to the Lord I was made free, and got a full discharge.

To my Advent brethren in the Lord, I want to ask one question: When the Master comes will he say well done, in that direction?

Praise.

H. WILLET.

The Sweet Singer of Israel, throughout his Psalms speaks a great deal about praising the Lord in various ways, and by various means, or instruments of music. And in summing up, in the last, or 150th Psalm, he calls on "everything that hath breath" to praise the Lord. Some of the Psalms seem to be scarcely anything but praise (see 136th Psalm.) David said it was a good thing to praise the Lord, and good to sing praises unto our God, and pleasant. And again he says, he will praise him "while he has any being." Thus in his psalms, from beginning to end, it is praise and thanksgiving. And it is not only David who praises the Lord, but we hear Job uttering praise in all his afflictions, thus: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Also the other prophets, and Christ his disciples. Hear Peter, Paul, Silas, and others praising the Lord. Praise being so conspicuous a theme in the Bible, and so much inculcated and recommended to all, surely we should try to understand it, so that in trying to follow in the path of the just, we too may be able to praise and sing with the Spirit and understanding, and make melody in our hearts, as well as with our voices, or instruments of music. The question arises, What is true praise to God? I find that the utterances of praise on the part of David were the result of a contemplation of God, and his attributes, in connection with his wonderful works toward the children of men. And also by keeping in view the tender mercy of God, was he especially prompted to praise. Hence the expression, "Praise ye the Lord, for his mercy endureth forever;" and this declaration repeated again, and again, seems to be a key-note to many of the inspired melodies. A correct conclusion to be drawn from the inspired testimony I believe is this: that to sound forth, or to give the Lord true praise, it is very necessary to study his word and contemplate his works. And when we can realize the fact that the tender mercy of the God is over all his works, and that the testimony of his word is love to the children of men, then we can begin to catch some of the melodious strains contained in the Book of praise. And as we advance, keeping in mind the key note, "God is love," we begin to edify ourselves and others by the rehearsal of the sweet melodies reverberating all through the different parts of God's written music, given us to learn. Ah, who that has once caught the spirit of the heavenly strain, wafted down to us by the ages, as uttered by angelic lips on Bethlehem's plain, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men," can forget their Lord? Who that has received the testimony of the word in regard to the true condition of man without a Saviour, but can appreciate the labor of love, and weep tears of sorrow and joy over the sad, sweet story of the cross. But if man be taught by man or devil that he is equal to God as to extent of future being by virtue of his nature, how can he properly appreciate the declaration falling from the Saviour's lips, that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." In view of this declaration, can we not with David say, "Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord." I understand by the wording of the Psalmist a possibility of compliance or there would not be an exhortation: and also that the sentence implies a conditional command, "let every thing praise the Lord;" that is, if there be a willingness, then praise the Lord. And also in the light of prophecy, that all things would praise the Lord finally. Let us hear the Revelator: And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, hear I saying, Blessing and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him, that sittith upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. And the four beasts said Amen." (Rev. 5.) Fellow mortal, can you not also say amen, to the precious promise of God's word, that there will be a time of blessing and praise, instead of cursing? when the Devil and his works shall all be destroyed? (Heb. 2-14 and 1 John 5-8). "Praise ye the Lord."

The State of the dead.

HATTIE WEED.

In all matters pertaining to a worldly character, we as rational beings should exercise our judgment and discretion, in order that we may discern the right from the wrong—the real from the false: If worldly matters are of so much importance which soon vanish away, and are gone forever, who can estimate the value of spiritual things which last through all time and eternity? How necessary it is that right views may be formed upon the subject which is of so great importance. Everything which tends to make men happier and better is worthy of earnest thought and careful consideration. The Bible, God's best gift to man, was intended to be a guide to his feet and a lamp to his path; to show him his duty to his maker, his fellow mortals, and himself; to lead him by its teachings through this weary world, on to the promised home beyond. Without it the christian would be tossed about like a ship without a rudder, with no knowledge of his future destiny. Sacred writing, as well as profane, has its readers who differ in opinion relating to the truths brought before them. One great truth brought before us in the Bible relating to "The state of the dead" is met with such a diversity of opinions that it seems hardly possible to be settled in our own minds on this subject. In order that it may be fully understood, a careful perusal of the holy scriptures, and an excersise of all our reasoning powers, is necessary. It has long been a query in my mind why it was that a judgment was necessary if all receive their reward at death? And why is it that christians fear to die, if death is the gate to endless joy? Why is it that they recoil with a shudder from crossing the dark river which leads them at once into paradise? And when they get there, how is it possible for them to be happy when they can look down on this earth and witness the sufferings of those near and dear to them? It is simply impossible. The Bible does not advocate any such doctrine. It must be plain to all persons of sound judgment that "the dead know not anything" for it is so declared in the divine Word. They sleep their last sleep till the last trump shall sound, which shall arouse them to a new being.

Let us be thankful for the light that we have, and pray that others may be brought to a knowledge of the truth.

Commendable.

C. C. M.

The Bible is the Book of books. It is justly worthy of the pre-eminence over all other books. It deserves a place at the head of every man's business. And he, who with pure motives carries the Scriptures into his daily avocation, may expect heaven's grace upon the work of his hands. Still the rich, the great, and the monopolizers of this fast age pay but little heed to this blessed book. They pass it by with indifference or treat it with scorn. I was most happily surprised the other day on entering the cars on the Galena division of the C. & N. W. R. to find books distributed in beautiful racks within reaching distance of the passengers, with these words printed on the side, "The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." What, thought I, is Jesus Christ recognized as a Saviour here? Railroad hands are usually profaners of that name. Fearing I might be mistaken and humbugged by the superscription, I took the book from its quiet resting place, and opening to the 19th chapter of Luke I read carefully the whole chapter. There is no mistake. It is the blessed book it professes to be. It seemed to me that chapter had a beauty in it I had never seen before. The coloquy with Zaccheus, the parable of ten pieces of money, Jesus riding into Jerusalem on a colt while the people exclaimed, "Blessed be the king that cometh in the name of the Lord;" and stopping on the brow of Olivet the compassionate Master weeps over the desolate and forsaken city.

I asked a brakeman sitting near what this meant, and who this book was put here to benefit. "The passengers," was the prompt reply. "The company has put them on all day trains for the accommodation of the traveling public." Well, thought I, it's commendable, to say the least. This is by no means an argument in favor of the Whitbyan theory of Millennium. Placing Bibles on passenger trains will never convert the world. But perhaps some one or two or more may be converted by this means and saved in the kingdom. What a grand enterprise!

The Spirit of Christianity.

JAMES A. NEWTON.

I am glad that there is a christianity in the world, by which all enlightened followers of Christ are cemented by a definite unbroken bond. That there are none others, who will finally attain to a crown of life in the final issue, we do not even intimate. But, that spirit of Him who came into the world to save makes his people one it cannot be denied. Oh, what a cheering thought is this to the minister of Christ, who teaches and preaches a christianity which commends itself to all mankind. And again, to the laity this is a boon of heavenly love, that his people are one in the spirit of Christ Jesus our Lord. Among the numerous creeds of christian faith, the faithful soldier finds no jar of sentiment in duty. Here we are one in brotherly love.

These sentiments and this spirit are sustained by the Great Teacher, and they are in harmony one with another, conferring a blessing to mankind, giving a joy only emanating from God its author. Our items of difference in Bible interpretation, never should create a feeling of animosity in the believer's mind. When we refuse to accord to others the liberty we wish to enjoy ourselves, we are both blind and bigoted. In the strength of Israel's God and the covenant of his grace may we stand forth before mankind untrammelled and unfettered by these allurements of him who would rejoice with the ungodly in an unprofitable and wicked controversy.

So charming is the spirit of christianity that even its bitterest enemies are vanquished by its influence. I love a friend and brother in Christ Jesus, 'who walks not after the flesh,' whether he be African, Swede, or American, king or peasant. There is nothing so pleasing to the faithful as to meet and greet a sacrificing friend of God and his church. And now, O, let this spirit characterize us, dearly beloved, and crowns and palms shall be given us at his coming and kingdom.

Some Excellent Thoughts.

VIRGIL HUNT.

A few good thoughts were brought out by a Presbyterian minister from the following words: "Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do then with Jesus who is called Christ?" (Mat. 27: 22.) He went on to say that all other questions, when compared to this, fell into insignificance. And as he proceeded I thought truly what a great and important question this is: "What shall I do then with Jesus?" And my mind ran back to the context, where Judas sold Jesus for thirty pieces of silver, and then the result which followed: "He departed and hanged himself."

And thus we see the fearful result of bartering our interest in the Son of God. But have we not sold Jesus cheaper still? Have we not sold him for earthly pleasures? Have not some of us sold him for the ball room—others for the pleasure of running horses—some for a game of billiards—a glass of liquor? Let us think how easily it is to sell the Lamb of God. I do not wonder when Pilate saw the miserable fall of Judas, that the question came home to his heart in thunder-tones, "What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ?" Our brother well said, "the question is in the singular (not plural)." Then the question comes home to each of us, separately, "What shall we do with Jesus?" When he comes in his glory with all the holy angels, may God grant that writer and reader may have acceptance of him.

The Bible Grows with One.

If you come to Holy Scripture with growth in grace, and with aspirations for yet higher attainments, the book grows with you, grows upon you. It is even beyond you, and cheerily cries: 'Higher yet: Excelsior!" Many books in my library are now behind and beneath me; I read them years ago, with considerable pleasure; I have read them since with disappointment; I shall never read them again, for they are of no service to me. They were good in their way once, and so were the clothes I wore when I was ten years old; but I have outgrown them—I know more than these books know, and I know wherein they are faulty. Nobody ever outgrows Scripture; the book widens and deepens with our years. It is true, it cannot really grow, for it is perfect; but it does so to our apprehension. The deeper you dig into Scripture, the more you find that it is a great abyss of truth. The beginner learns four or five points of orthodoxy, and says: "I understand the gospel, I have grasped all the Bible." Wait a bit, and when his soul grows and knows more of Christ, he will confess; "Thy commandment is exceeding broad—I have only begun to understand it."—Spurgeon.

THERE is dew in one flower and not in another, because one opens its cup and takes it, while the other closes itself, and the drop runs off. So God rains goodness and mercy as wide as the dew, and if we lack them it is because we will not open our hearts to receive him.

IN temporal danger seek spiritual security.

The Christian Life.

Have Faith in God.

There's a fullness in God's mercy,
Like the fullness of the sea;
There's a kindness in His justice
Which is more than liberty.

There's no place where earthly sorrows,
Are more felt than up in heaven;
There's no place where earthly failings
Have such kindly judgment given.

For the love of God is broader
Than the treasure of man's mind;
And the heart of the Eternal
Is most wonderfully kind.

But we make his love too narrow
By false limits of our own;
And we magnify his strictness
With a zeal we will not own.

Pining souls, come nearer Jesus;
Come, but come not doubting thus:
Come with faith that trusts more freely
His great tenderness for us.

If our love were but more simple,
We should take him at his word;
And our lives would be all sunshine
In the sweetness of our Lord.

Worldliness.

How vain the attempt to reconcile worldliness and spirituality!—to harmonize the service of mammon and of God! They who make the attempt, forget the character of the age and the course of the world in which they live. They forget that Jew and Gentile, having joined in the rejection and crucifixion of Him whom God sent to be the Saviour of the lost, the world lies under the guilt of that daring act of consummated wickedness.

Think you that God will not avenge the act? Think you that the sentence will not be executed—"Now is the judgment of this world"? They who do not receive this world, and who do not believe that the present is a period of God's long-suffering, and that a day is approaching in which the vials of His wrath will be poured out on an unrepentant and ungodly world, must read their Bibles with little intelligence. It is expresly declared that at the end of the present age, "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed in flaming fire (2 Thes. 1); and that, as when "Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all; even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." (Luke 17.) The executioners of judgment, it is written, "will gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity." (Matt. 13: 41.) And again—"The Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." (Isa. 26: 21.) Such is the crisis to which we are hastening!

And if we are "delivered from this present evil world" (Gal. 1: 4), by the hand of omnipotent grace, and are brought into fellowship with God's Son, as "joint-heirs" with him in glory, what line of conduct becomes us while on our way to our heavenly inheritance? Are we to form an alliance with a world that is stained with the blood of God's Son? Are we to forget that "whosoever will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God"? (James 4: 4.)

Blessed JESUS! oh, that our eyes were anointed with the heavenly eye-salve, that we might behold THEE in thine excellency! Then would the rays of thy glory, lingering on our eye balls dim our vision for other things. Reveal thyself, then, to our eye of faith, as thou didst of old to thy martyr Stephen, to the eye of sense. Wean our unfaithful hearts from earthly things. Extricate our hands from the entanglement of the world, and break every bond that hinders from self-surrender, and consecration to thy services. Give us more earnestness in seeking to rescue sinners from impending judgment, and keep us waiting and watching for the dawn of that long-expected day, when we shall see thee as thou art, be transformed into thine image, and be with thee for ever!—Dublin Tract.

Advent Christian Times.

WM. SHELDON, - EDITOR.

*_*Give your Name, Postoffice, County and State every time you write.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, October 7, 1873.

AN obituary notice has been received from Dr. Mathewson, announcing the death of Julia, one of our former office hands, who is still affectionately remembered by those who knew her best. But she now sleeps.

PLEDGES PAID.—Under this head, in the business column, all who pay their pledges will find an acknowledgment. It will be just as well for many to pay their pledges soon, as to wait, and much better for the office, as the money must be at once applied on the debt to stop interest.

WE regret to learn that Eld. P. W. Hough contemplates leaving Wis. in the spring, to settle in Iowa. It will be a loss that Wis. will feel sensibly, for he has been one of the most active men in our conference in spite of his advanced age. But Wisconsin's loss will be gain to Iowa.

ELD. GEO. THOMSON, of Arena, Wis., is still confined to his bed, unable to help himself. A short time ago he attempted to preach to a few who gathered at his house, sitting in a chair. He is not so well now as then—was not able to be carried to the dedication, as he had fondly hoped. May the Lord yet raise him up.

WE notice that it has been decided to change the name of the Advent Herald, to Messiah's Herald. It does not advocate our views of the nature of man, but in other respects is an excellent paper, and is well edited by Br. Orrock. It finds a weekly welcome at our office.

ALL letters for the paper, all obituary notices, and articles for publication should be sent to the Editor, at 25 West Lake street Chicago, and not to Brodhead, Wis. Only private letters should be sent to Brodhead, and even those may be sent to Chicago by writing "personal," on the envelope. By remembering this, delays will be prevented.

AN exchange appropriately says: "The pulpit should be like the heart of the fragrant flowers where the sweetness is, then you may trust that the busy people, like bees, will find the honey. The gospel rightly apprehended is full of winning power. Christ, lifted up, draws all men to himself. Where Jesus and the resurrection are the theme of preaching, there, surely, will be salvation and honor and glory."

DURING our recent absence, the mail brought us a sample copy of the Rochester discussion on "Time," between Brn. Barker and Whitmore. Having read only a part of it up to the present date, we cannot yet speak of the merits of the arguments used pro and con; and if we could, no doubt our readers would prefer to come to their own conclusions on reading the work, without being influenced by an expression of our mind. For sale at our office. Price 50 cents per copy.

WE find a general conviction among our ministers that we ought to make a special effort to raise a tract fund to supply destitute fields, as a missionary enterprise. We expect that this enterprise will meet with general favor among our brethren, as well as among our ministers. Let the noble work be commenced without delay. Who will be the first to patronize the "Western Tract Fund"? If you cannot send in donations at present, send a pledge payable on or before the first of January. We mean business, if you will help stay up our hands.

CORRECTION.—The following note is from Eld. J. Ridley, Iowa:

"BR. SHELDON:—In the last TIMES, in the report of the Iowa camp meeting, the sentence, "There were many who bore witness to Jesus' power to save, who, years ago were in the service of Satan," should read, "There were many who bore witness to Jesus' power to save, who, one year ago were in the service of Satan." Please correct.

Now is the time for every one of our ministers to plan for an earnest and active campaign. The evenings favor protracted efforts, and no time should be lost in gaining the ears of the people. How few of our preachers are doing full work. Let us have a reform in this respect. Preachers should be workers, not for notoriety or filthy lucre, but workers for God, doing full work. Do not enter the field as mere theological disputants, but as warm-hearted Christian ministers. Breathe the right spirit while you proclaim the right message.

ON Sunday Sept. 28th, it was our privilege to attend the dedication of the Arena (Wis.) house of worship, in connection with Brn. P. W. Hough, P. Hitchcock, B. Meigs, A. N. Hitchcock and M. D. Peavey. It is a plain house of worship, without any useless appendages. The meeting was well attended, and is to be followed by a series of meetings by Eld. Hough, which we hope will be productive of much good. Eld. P. Hitchcock has been chosen by the church as their pastor, in place of Eld. Thomson, their former faithful pastor.

WE here repeat what we have said in substance before: though we intend to be sufficiently lenient to give a reasonable margin for views contrary to those which the paper is specially intended to proclaim, we shall not consent to let such leniency become a monopoly. When we publish one article on a theme that our people do not endorse, another writer thinks he has an equal right to write on the same topic, confirming the views of the first writer. We view the matter differently: having given some space to a view we regard incorrect is a good reason why we should claim the balance of our space for our legitimate work. While we give some attention to general investigation, we have a special work that claims the most of our time and space.

What They Say.

The Weekly Pilgrim, published at James Creek, Pennsylvania, thus speaks:

THE ADVENT CHRISTIAN TIMES Publishing Co. are liquidating a debt of $4,000 by gratuitous funds from its patrons in cash and pledges. Last week there was over $800 sent in pledges besides a considerable amount of cash. That looks like business.

And we think it is time to be "about our Master's business."

The Western Tract Fund should be revived without delay, and the land be flooded with truth that has so long been kept in the shade. Many who have done nothing on the debt will have their consciences greatly eased by lifting nobly on the Tract Fund. We are flooded with calls for tracts that we cannot furnish. Help us sow the seed.

To Ministers.

The Methodist Recorder says a few things to ministers on personal appearance that might profit some of our ministers if they would heed the remarks:

Ministers should give attention to their personal habits and appearance. Slovenliness and foppishness are equally inexcusable. Cleanliness of body is a certain accompaniment of pure religion in the soul. The laws of health and the requirements of the gospel both agree in demanding a clean skin and neat apparel. However poor in purse a minister may be, he must keep his pores open and his garments neat and orderly. Finger-nails in mourning, dandruffed scalp, crumpled and sweated collars, and unwashed feet are abominations to be avoided. We do not put in a plea for vanity of fashion—far from it; but we do think the example of the ministers of the gospel should be such as to win respect, even in such superficials as dress and all outward deportment. True Methodism implies clean bodies as well as renewed spirits.

The Enjoyment of Life.

Idleness is not the true enjoyment of life; nor is that enjoyment dependent upon unbounded wealth. Many people of limited financial means really enjoy life better than their rich neighbors. Healthful exercise is no detriment to true enjoyment of life. A proper amount of work is both honorable and healthful. A secular paper thus treats this question:

It is singular to what an extent people believe happiness depends on not being obliged to work. Girls are considered well married if their husbands are wealthy, and boys considered well provided for if enough can be left them for support, and enough left for them to play business with. Honest, hearty, contented labor is the only source of happiness, as well as the guarantee of life. The gloom of misanthropy is not only a great destroyer of happiness we might have, but it tends to destroy life itself. Idleness and luxury induce premature decay much faster than any trade regarded as the most exhaustive and fatal to longevity. Labor, in general, instead of shortening the term of life, actually increases it. It is the lack of occupation that actually destroys so many of the wealthy, who have nothing to do but play the part of drones, and like them make a speedy exit, while the busy bee fills out its day of usefulness and honor."

"Hell."

An ancient prophet affirmed concerning the wicked—"Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them." Amos 9:2. Sheol, the term here rendered "hell," can be reached by digging; hence, it is connected with this material globe. But the occupants of this "hell" are to be taken out of it, instead of remaining there perpetually. And this hell is finally, not only to deliver up its occupants, but is itself to be consumed—"And death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them....and death and hell were cast into the lake of fire." (Rev. 20: 13, 14).

For the accommodation of that class of sticklers for our version of the Bible, who tell us that "hell" means hell, whether from sheol or hades, and not the state of the dead regardless of character; and who on this assumption insist that the hell of punishment already exists, and that sinners receive their punishment therein at death, we will grant their claim by way of experiment; and even then the eternity of torment is cut off, for this hell goes into the lake of fire. Here ends this hell; and if it is really the hell of punishment, of course it is the end of punishment too, unless it can be shown that God is to arrange two such hells for the same sinners. Besides, Christ went to this same hell—"He seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell." (Acts 2: 31.) Did he go to hell of torment, or simply to the state of the dead?

☞ A Disappointment Impending.

A few days or weeks will bring a disappointment either to some who are confidently expecting the return of the Nobleman from the far country, or to the class who are saying, "Where is the promise of his coming"? Better, by far, be disappointed in looking for the Saviour too soon, than to be disappointed in having him come before we are ready to meet him. We have no faith in that Christianity that looks forward with contemplative delight to the anticipated disappointment of waiting ones, even though the march of time should prove them premature in their computations. We respect the principle of love for the advent of the divine King wherever we find it, even though it may sometimes be associated with dogmatism. We conceive the error in this direction to be vastly smaller than the extreme prophetic apathy that pervades the hearts of many even among our own people, who seem anxious to remove the old waymarks, and to erase the stigma that attaches itself to prophetic investigations. We would not blot out the past if we could; though some human appendages are to be deplored, as in the history of the apostles, growing out of human weakness; still the grand proclamation has had its foundation in the fulfillment of prophecy, proving the nearness of the Messiah's return to earth. When he comes, the masses of professors will be disappointed, including too many of our own people, against whom the door will be shut. Solemn thought.

While we do not see sufficient evidence to induce us to accept the point of time to which some are looking for redemption, we do not feel at all like "smiting" those who do, and would like to know that they are correct. Time will soon tell the story. Let all be ready.

Abel in Heaven.

We clip the following from the editorial department of the Methodist Recorder:

The first man who met death was Abel, and he conquered through to heaven. Not Adam, the first sinner, nor Cain, the first hypocrite, but righteous Abel was the first to fall before the destroyer. But in falling, he rose. In dying, he lived. The first soul that parted from earth was wafted to paradise. Death does not indicate divine displeasure; for he whom God loved best died first. The murderer was permitted to linger in this mortal life a prisoner in punishment. So from the beginning we read, in the very facts of chronology and biography that there is a higher and better existence than this. It is Christ to live. It is gain to die.

If assertions were proof, the editor would have his case. Mark these points:

1. While the soul is in the body it is "a prisoner."

2. When Abel's soul was let out of prison it "was wafted to paradise." Then was not Cain very kind to set the prisoner free, and send it to paradise? And is it not strange that God ever made a law against liberating such prisoners? To sufferers like Paul it is often "gain to die," but dead men can not go to paradise till they live again: "When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory;" and that is soon enough, as the judgment is not due till then: and who wishes to enter glory in an unjudged state, to be again removed for judgment?

"In dying, he lived." God never said so through any of his inspired servants, but just the reverse was said to Hezekiah: "Thou shalt die, and not live." (Is. 38: 2.) That can not mean "Thou shalt die, and continue to live." Death ends life, and it remains extinct till the resurrection restores it. Abel was the first man that died, and he is still dead, awaiting the resurrection of the just.

Geology and the Bible.

It is often claimed, with an air of triumph, that geology proves the Bible untrue; and many who are eager for some pretext to throw off divine restraints, take up the strain, and reiterate it with enthusiasm, and the Bible is ruthlessly hurled to the moles and bats, as a thing tried and found wanting. The United Presbyterian publishes from its Colorado Correspondent, the following account of the geological structure of mountains near Denver, detrimental to the arguments used to invalidate the Bible:

The South Park is about from twelve to twenty-five miles wide, and forty or fifty miles long. It is probably the bed of some ancient lake. But you can't tell anything about this country. It has evidently been once all torn to pieces by volcanic action. Coal beds are vertical or perpendicular, in veins like silver or gold lodes. Some of them have been sunk to a depth of one or two hundred feet, and I don't know how much deeper they go. Where a geologist would expect to find the first limestone, he will as likely as not find granite, and where his science or books tell him to look for granite, he is just as likely to find the old red sandstone, porphyry, or slate, or flint, or something else.

I know an English geologist here who has sunk several holes from two hundred to two thousand feet deep, and he says, as the result of his experiments, that in this country there is no reliance to be placed in the commonly received doctrines of geology. Well, if geology will not tell the truth here, must Moses be put down as untruthful, merely because "scientists," falsely so called, affirm that geology and the Bible are at variance? I know a place not ten miles from here where there is malachite now in a formation state. Two years ago it was softer than putty. At present it is quite hard. If it hardens as fast for two years more, it will be as hard as agate or jasper. Then let one of the self conceited "scientists" of the present day look at it. He will put on his glasses and look wise and say: "Well, that's malachite (from the Greek malachae). It is a native carbonate of copper: it occurs in mammilary masses, consisting of concentric layers having a fibrous structure," etc., etc. Then he tells its age, perhaps five or ten thousand years, with as much confidence or positiveness and pretence of philosophy as if he really knew much about it, and with the same positiveness he will turn around and say, These things being so, the Bible must necessarily be a humbug. I could then tell him that I wrote my name in that malachite only four years ago, when it was as soft as mud and as pliable as his science.

Soul and Spirit.

In a Baptist paper we find the following question from a correspondent, with the editor's answer:

Is the soul and spirit of man identical? If not, what is the nature and office of each?

The editor thus replies:

1. The soul and spirit of man are not identical. The only reason that we will now assign is that animals are not spoken of in the Bible as having souls as well as men. Whereas, so far as we have been able to distinguish clearly between a man and an animal, the former has a spirit and the latter has not.

2. That in the more popular use of the words soul and spirit in the Bible no distinction is made. The terms are perhaps in many instances used as entirely synonymous.

3. That in the common and unscientific use of terms in the present soul and spirit are not distinguished. The word soul is in fact now commonly used for spirit, and there are perhaps few who are willing, outside of scientific readers, to recognize any distinction between the soul and the spirit. We do not think that it would be at all profitable to enter into a discussion of the distinct natures known as spirit and soul, and hence we are inclined to ask our brother to be content with the above. A perusal of such works as Delitzsch's Biblical Psychology, or Dr. Hickok's Rational Psychology will cast much light upon this difficult subject.

Confusion worse confounded.

1. They are pronounced "not identical," on the assumption that animals have souls as well as men, but not spirits. Wonder if this editor ever read in Ecc. 3: 21 about the "spirit of the beast"? Then why deny that the beast has a spirit?

2. Then the Bible is said to use these same terms in a "more popular sense," in which soul and spirit are made "entirely synonymous." So the Bible uses these terms in both a popular and an unpopular sense, does it?

3. Finally science distinguishes between soul and spirit; and the editor thinks that psychology "will cast much light upon this difficult subject." Had he better not come to the light of the Bible?

If soul and spirit are personalities, they are either one or two—no matter whether we come to Bible, science, psychology, or any other standard. Is the soul a personality independent of the body? And is the spirit another personality? Then the question is pertinent: "What is the nature and office of each? Have they the same nature and the same office?

WHEN it is not despicable to be poor, we want fewer things to live in poverty with satisfaction, than to live magnificently with riches.—St. Evremond.

The Number of the Saved.

J. S. WIMBISH.

The Revelator in vision saw the holy city—the new Jerusalem—"coming down from God out of heaven, adorned as a bride to meet her husband." The city lieth four-square—or it is cubiform—and the length, the breadth and the height of it are equal." This mammoth city, with twelve foundations of precious stones was measured, 1500 miles either way, and if as densely peopled as our modern cities throughout each foundation, would be capable of containing 540,855,000,000 immortal beings. And this is only the city—the capital—of the glorious kingdom to be established in the new earth, wherein shall dwell righteousness. From the center of this great capital, even unto the uttermost parts of the earth, this glory of God will be seen, and the saints shall dwell secure from all harm forever and ever.

In this new earth John saw assembled a great multitude which no man could number. So great was the number who wore white robes, and bore palms in their hands, that figures, though they may give the number of the great multitude, would be insufficient to convey a correct estimate to the brain of finite man.

Such would be the case if one in a thousand of all who have ever lived and died on earth of Adam's race since creation were assembled in one vast congregation. What! only one in one thousand to be saved.

If this be true what a startling commentary upon the philanthropy, love and mercy of those who put off the coming of our King for thousands—yea even millions of years!

If these figures be correct men should begin to pray for the speedy return of our King—"awake to righteousness and sin not."

This is the boasted age of civilization, advancement in science, arts, and above all, in religion. Religion—the religion of those who believe in a sky-kingdom—is said to be spreading far and wide—and is soon to cover the whole earth, even as the waters cover the vasty deep.

Let us see if this is so when measured by the rule of figures—which tell the truth and lie not. Not one in ten of the inhabitants of this earth, in this day of enlightenment and reform, make an open profession of religion. The whole population of those portions of the earth claiming to be guided by the Christian religion is about 388,000,000 and not more than one in ten of this number profess to bear the cross. This would make about one in every thirty of all the human race professing Christianity. And when the great Harvester, whose fan is in his hand, shall come to winnow the grain, and burn up the tares and chaff, then will be a separation not dreamed of by poor mortal man. Ah, how many who have appeared to be good and perfect grain will be with the chaff cast out, or gathered with the tares of the wicked enemy's sowing. May we be ever watchful, as was the unwearied Paul, that in the day of fearful reckoning we may not be cast away.

But supposing we count by man's standard of christianity and morals, it is very evident the world would have come to an end long before this time. If one in a thousand of all who have so lived and died on earth since the day our father Adam came forth perfect from the hand of God, were resurrected in the likeness of Christ and assembled in one vast multitude, an account of figures would convey but a faint idea of the "great multitude which no man can number."

Let us count the saved one among a thousand, and see if the earth will contain them.

We know of no correct method in arithmetic by which we can arrive, even approximately, at the number of human beings who have ever lived on earth.

I shall not require every skeptic to believe the calculations I shall make, but if he can refute the argument used or prove the premises false, I would like him to do it. Some years ago a lover of figures estimated that if the world had been standing for six thousand years the number of human beings living and passing away from earth would, if properly interred, make of the whole earth a vast cemetery six times dug over—oceans, seas and lakes included. For the sake of brevity I will suppose this to be a correct estimate. And let those who doubt, reflect that every pulse of the heart makes the death of a mortal.

The earth's surface contains 196,850,000 square miles. This would give 5,555,894,400,000,000 square feet as the surface of the earth. Dividing by 24 and then multiplying by six, we have as the number resting in the bosom of mother earth awaiting the shout of the archangel, and the sound of the trump of God, 1,388,973,600,000,000. If one in a thousand of these were assembled in the earth, would not the earth be inhabited by the saints even from the rivers unto the ends of the earth? The number would be 1,388,973,600,000—no man can get a correct idea of this number in his head. Would the renewed earth contain this vast throng of immortal beings? O yes, and more besides. The number I trow could be swelled to 1,500,000,000,000 and then if there was no more room on earth we could go visiting, and take the wings of spiritual bodies and fly throughout God's universe, if Christ be with us and lead us. But the earth would be our home, and here we would have our inheritance.

John says, "and there was no more sea," for all things have become "new." What a change! Eternal fields of beauty where now rolls the briny deep. "And the desert shall blossom as the rose." The hot burning sands of Sahara will become a wide and fertile valley of flowers and tropical fruits—living, imperishable food for immortal man.

Where now arid wastes and scorching sands disfigure our earth, will be shady woods and purling streams of living water. Ah! those unfathomed fertile depths of old ocean at the thunder of the voice of the Almighty will be revealed for the first time to the vision of man—immortal man Fruits and flowers will spring up in a day where now the waves chase each other down.

If no more sea, the earth with our present wants would be capable of sustaining 1,500 times as many beings as now live upon it.

Oh, Father, let thy will be done, and may the day soon dawn and the night sink into oblivion. Let us hasten unto the coming of the Lord! when our cup shall be full to overflowing, and the whole earth be filled with the glory of God and his Christ. Amen.

The Desire of all Nations.

The call of Abraham to be the friend of God, and father of the faithful, was not partiality to one man, or one people, but was designed for the benefit of all people. The necessary separation of the human race into families, nations, languages, and tongues, led to the loss of family origin. It was therefore necessary that one man, one family, one nation, should be chosen and kept distinct and separate from every other nation, through whom God would communicate his will and reveal his mercy in the redemption of mankind, and that it might be known as the will and work of the infinite God.

God, therefore, in the exercise of his Divine Sovereignty, for reasons known to himself, though we may not know them, chose from all the men on earth, Abraham, and said: "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that will I show thee; and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."

In the fulfillment of this promise, Isaac was born, and from Isaac descended Jacob, and the twelve patriarchs—the heads of the twelve tribes, one of which had to be chosen, through whom Messiah was to come; and the choice fell on Judah. But the tribe consisted of many families; it was necessary, therefore, that one of the families should be chosen, and the choice fell on Jesse; and as the family of Jesse consisted of eight sons, it was necessary that one of the sons should be chosen; and Samuel, the prophet, was directed to anoint David, who became not only King, but the type of the Messiah, and the line by which his coming should be known.

All the prophecies and promises relating to the Messiah of the Old Testament—the Christ of the New Testament Scriptures, centre in this people, in this tribe, and in this family. It was necessary, therefore, to the integrity of God's truth, in the fulfillment of prophecy, that this family should be preserved, and it should be known that they were preserved. The ten tribes carried into captivity are the lost tribes; but Judah, with Benjamin, also carried into captivity, were mercifully preserved, and about 536 years B. C., by the decrees of Cyrus, were returned to their own land—the city was restored and the temple was rebuilt; and in the archives of the nation the family registers were religiously kept. In the book of Ezra we have the names of the heads of the families of Judah, Benjamin, and a part of the tribe of Levi, who returned under the ministry of Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel; and with varied fortune they retained their places in the land of promise until their mission was accomplished.

In the fullness of time Christ came. Not too early in the world's history—not in the fabulous ages—not before the time of authentic records; but in the most advanced stages of the ancient civilizations; when philosophy, adorned by the charms of poetry, had done its best, and the world by wisdom knew not God.

Unwittingly to the rulers of this world God uses them to bring about the good purposes of his will. "The wrath of man shall praise him," and the policy of the proud heathen king was the proximate cause of the removal of the holy family to the place where prophecy demanded that Messiah should be born. "There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed—and all went to be taxed, every one into his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, in Judea, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem (because he was of the house and lineage of David); and so it was that, while they were there, she brought forth her first-born son. And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night; and lo! the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring unto you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David; a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

The child thus born was universally acknowledged to be the Son of David, and rightful inheritor of the throne, possessed of power more available for conquest than "marshalled squadrons and legions of armed men," he refused to use it in gratifying their worldly ambition by breaking the Roman yoke and making them, what they vainly imagined they ought to be, the rulers of the world, and they wished none other, and therefore rejected him; but in rejecting him they themselves were rejected, and became the tribes of the "weary feet." The prophecy fulfilled, the preservation of the tribe and family was no longer vital to the interests of the world, and in a little time they ceased to be the objects of the special care of Heaven.—Methodist Home Journal.

True Sovereignty.

Alexander, the King of Macedonia, is known in history as a great robber. Before he went to Asia, in order to subdue it, he sat one day lost in deep thought. Aristotle, a wise man of his time, came to him, and said:

"Why dost thou delay, O King? Thy treasury is full, thy armies are ready, every thing smiles on thee."

"I was thinking," answered Alexander, "whether the bit of glory I shall gain, and all Asia which I shall conquer, be worth the trouble of taking a single step before the house here."

"Thou art indeed right," replied Aristotle; "but the matter is easily set right. Since the sovereignty of the world does not seem worth thy taking pains for it, then set before thyself a higher aim—the sovereignty over thyself, and the happiness of the other life."

Alexander heard the good advice, but history shows that he did not heed it. Although he almost conquered the then know world, although he heaped up treasures and riches, and was reverenced by his soldiers as a god, yet he was not happy, because he could not rule himself. His pride and avarice were as insatiable as the sea. At a banquet, he once fell into such a passion that he killed his most faithful and trusty servant. How true it is, that "he who ruleth his own spirit, is greater that he that taketh a city!"

Fecundity of Fishes.

It is said that probably about 60,000,000 or 70,000,000 codfish are taken from the sea annually around the shores of Newfoundland. But even that quantity seems small when we consider that the cod yields something like 3,500,000 eggs each season, and that even 8,000,000 have been found in the row in a single cod! Other fish, though not equalling the cod, are also wonderfully productive. A herring six or seven ounces in weight is provided with about 30,000 ova. After making all reasonable allowances for the destruction of eggs and of the young, it has been calculated that in three years a single pair of herrings would produce 154,000,000. Buffon said that if a pair of herrings were left to breed and multiply undisturbed for a period of twenty years they would yield a fish-bulk equal to the globe on which we live. The cod far surpasses the herring in fecundity. Were it not that vast numbers of eggs are distroyed; fish would so multiply as to fill the waters completely.—Scientific American.

Be Valiant.—The best Christians, while here they live, are both prone to faint by reason of their own weakness, and also in hazard to be foiled by reason of their enemies' power; the Apostle Paul, therefore, in the closing up of the epistle to the Ephesians, taketh upon him the person of a wise, vigilant, and valiant Captain; and in soldier-like terms animateth the Lord's soldiers, that they neither faint in themselves nor be daunted with their enemies and because of themselves they are as children, and no better able to wield the armor of God than David the armor of Saul, he addeth the heavenly exercises of prayer, teaching them how to pray for themselves and others.—William Gouge.

Miscellaneous.

AT HOME.

—The Crow Indians are reported to have surrendered their Yellowstone reservation.

—It is said that in some portions of Minnesota frogs are thicker than grasshoppers ever were.

—The Ohio Falls Car and Locomotive Company has stopped work, thereby throwing about four hundred men out of employment.

—A stranger, with his skull fractured, was found dead in a stable, at Bourbon, Ind. The suspected murderer has not been arrested.

—A reduction of the national debt by $1,901,467 was the gratifying news conveyed in the public debt statement for September. It is an easy matter to carp and criticise, but the most inveterate croaker must confess that the result has been far better than most reasonable persons had expected.

—In the State Democratic Convention, at Utica, New York, it was decided to admit the Tammany delegation to a share in the deliberations, but the Apollo Hall people were refused admission, and they returned to N. Y. city in a mood forboding discord in the ranks of the Democracy there.

—It is estimated that there are three hundred thousand Bohemians in this country, and yet there is not a religious paper, book, pamphlet, or tract printed in there language in all the land for the countrymen of John Huss. The papers published in their language are hostile to Christianity, and the people are largely Rationalists.

—Henri E. Van Vleet, Superintendent of the Poor, of Onondaga County, was struck by the express train coming East, at a station called Half Way, on the N. Y. C Railroad, September 27th His legs were taken off at the thigh and several ribs broken. He was brought to this city on the train, but lived only a few hours.

—The Vox Publica of Matamoros states that armed United States soldiers crossed from Texas into Mexico, about forty miles above this city, but for what purpose is unknown. It calls on the authorities to investigate the matter, and warns the Mexicans that such expeditions are premeditated, and urges them to be on the alert to repel such invasions when occasion may require.

—A civil service examination will soon be held in New York. The system of district examinations will save successful as well as unsuccessful candidates considerable expense, and enable many who could not otherwise compete for positions in the public service to present themselves. Of course, as formerly, applications must first be made at Washington.

—A remarkable manifesto has been published by Archbishop Manning in the form of a letter to the Roman Catholic Primate of Ireland. In it Dr. Manning expresses the opinion that Ireland is in a happier condition in regard to religion than any other country, and was never in so good a condition materially. The progress of Ireland, he says, is on the pathway of Christianity, while other countries have departed, or are departing from the faith. He sees no future, he says, for Imperial Germany, or for revolutionary Italy, or for Spain if it abandon its ancient Catholic traditions.

ABROAD.

—The manifesto of Count de Chambord has produced a good effect in Paris.

—Muley Abbas, brother of the deceased Emperor of Morocco, has been proclaimed his successor.

—The Cortes, on reassembling, September 26th proceeded to the election of a President of the Republic. Senora Castelar was elected.

—The London Times' special dispatch from Paris says that M. Thiers, on his return to that city, will resume the leadership of the party of the Left.

—There are 800,000 persons in Wales who know only the Welsh language, and Mr. Gladstone, in a recent speech, advised the people to learn their children to speak English, the common language of the United Kingdom.

—A party of several hundred Mormons arrived in Paris last week, on their way to America, were notified by the Prefect of Police that if they attempted to hold their religious exercises in public they would be expelled from the city.

—Mr. Plimsoll, M.P., Canada, in a speech made at a lunch a few days ago, stated that, during some years past, while the number of British ships had increased only 8 per cent., the number of accidents had increased 50 per cent.

—Sir Edwin Landseer, the celebrated English animal painter, with whose numerous fine works the majority of people in this country have been made familiar through steel engravings, died last week. Sir Edwin was born in London in 1802.

—A fearful railway accident occurred on the London and South Western Railway near Guildford, on the 10th inst. It was caused by a bullock getting on the track and throwing the train off. Three persons were killed and 18 wounded.

—The Spanish forces captured without resistance an encampment of 500 huts in Jova, Cuba. In a skirmish on the 20th inst., with the insurgents the Spaniards killed ten and took several prisoners. The Spaniards had six wounded and twelve bruised.

—Advices received at London, September 29, state that the British frigate Noble has bombarded the town of Omoa, in the state of Honduras, Central America, in consequence of an outrage upon the British flag. The natives, chiefly mulattoes, had made an attack on the British Consulate, sacked it, and pulled down the flag. The outrage was resented, and speedily punished by a heavy bombardment, doing much damage to the town, besides killing numbers of the Omoans.

—Reports from British Consuls on the production of tea in Japan have been issued. The best tea is, it is stated, produced in the province of Yamashiro. At Ogura, in that province, there are trees from 400 to 500 years old, producing tea worth $5 per pound. The hedges in the lanes and round the kitchen gardens in the villages are generally tree-shrubs. The production of tea in Japan in 1871 is estimated at about 36,000,000 pounds, about half the quantity being consumed in that country, and about half exported. It is thought that an increase of about fifteen per cent. per annum may be counted on for some years.

—The efforts of the foreign Consuls to prevent the bombardment of the city of Alicante, Spain, by the Spanish insurgent men-of-war failed. Admiral Yelverton declined to go beyond his instructions from London, which were "to maintain an absolutely neutral position." The churches, so far as heard from were generally in prosperous condition. Some new churches have been formed during past year Four new ones were received into the Conference—Mineral, Oneida, Carol and Brough ton The "ministers' reports" were cheering in many respects. They spoke of an ear to hear such as has not been before in this state The truth is taking deep hold on many hearts, and the great lack is for faithful men to go out and proclaim it. The following preach-brethren were heard from, either by letter or in person: A. Bailey, F. Burr, E. H. Burrington, A. Cairns, D. S. Clark, L. F. Cole, L. H Davis, A. A. Crocker, J. Drain, R. P. The subject of the publishing interest in the West was considerably agitated, and resolution was adopted declaring the Conference in sympathy with the purposes and work of the Western Association.

Encouraging reports were received from Neponset, Yorktown and DeKalb quarterly Conferences. Have had blessed meetings with increasing interest. Voted that the action of Neponset quarterly Conference in ordaining brother H. Willet to the ministry, was approved by this Conference.

Brother H. M. Goff was voted a preacher's license.

Brother F. Burr having moved to Ohio, was released from his membership in this Conference, at his own request. The prayers and kind wishes of the brethren, go with him, although no official action was taken.

Delegates to Norwood Park conference reported as follows

Brethren, your committee appointed to attend the western conference at Norwood Park, Ill., June 10, 1873, report as follows:

We were early at the meeting, and though we did and said what we justly could against making a change, there being a majority against us, the vote to transfer the property and effects of the W. A. C. P. Association by a 99 year lease to the W. A. C. P. Society was carried by twelve majority. Nevertheless we did what we could to have the new society organized on a proper basis and the constitution and by-laws in as good shape as possible.

On motion Clinton and Shiawassee counties were detached from the Northern District and added to the Southern District.

The following was presented and adopted:

Resolved, That we as a conference recommend the adoption by each one of our churches the following plan for the purpose of raising funds for our ministers:

1. Having ascertained the number of members in the church, and the probable amount to be raised, let an apportionment be made among the members "as the Lord hath prospered them."

2. That each member lay by him in store, on "the first day of each week" the necessary amount, and pay it into the hands of the treasurer who shall keep an account of the same, and also the amount by him paid out, stating the purpose for which it was paid

3. That the treasurer pay over to the preacher once a month, but not later than once a quarter, the amount due; the balance if any there be, to be appropriated at the discretion of the church.

4. That the deacon take charge of this matter, present the resolution and receive the name of each brother or sister with the amount they feel able to pay. If necessary the church may appoint a brother or sister for an assistant.

The following members were appointed delegates to the next western conference: John M. Snook, Chester Fox and William C. Hicks.

Concerning the death of Eld. A. Mackie, the resolutions passed at the last E. D. Q. M. were heartily adopted.

Whereas, For the last nine years Eld. Wm. L. Himes has been intimately connected with the conduct of our western paper under the names of the Voice of the West and the A. C. Times. And,

Whereas, His recent retirement from the paper, whose reputation and influence he has done so much to make what they are, render it peculiarly fitting that this conference, within whose bounds the paper was first published, should now give an expression of its feelings towards him as a man and a Christian. Therefore,

Resolved, That the members of this conference hereby express their grateful appreciation of the self-sacrificing labors, spotless integrity and unequaled ability shown by Eld. Wm. L. Himes as editor and business agent of the Advent Christian Times.

Resolved, That the foregoing minutes be forwarded to the A. C. Times, and World's Crisis for publication.

From Eld. D. S. Clark, Springfield, Ill.

Dear Bro. Sheldon:—This morning finds me in this city, well as common, having my trust in the God of my fathers, "looking for the same blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," to bring us life eternal, and fit up our Home. Oh may we all be ready to have the King say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you." When I think how much the Lord has done for me in showing me this blessed truth, I rejoice; a present truth, a sanctifying truth, a soul inspiring truth, one that makes us love God with all our heart, and our neighbor as we love ourselves, a truth that makes us free men and women in Christ, that takes out of our hearts all malice, and hatred, and envy, and pride, and the love of the flesh, and as John says: "Every man that hath this hope in him purifyeth himself even as he is pure." Christ was pure, holy, and good; so must we be if we have that hope in us. For God is love and he that dwelleth in God, and God in him. And we know that where sin is God will not dwell. Oh may we have fresh hearts, for the promise is if we love the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, and keep his Commandments in love to Christ, "we will come unto him and make our abode with him" "But he that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings"; and "the word which you hear is not mine but the Father's which sent me." Are we keeping his words? Are our hearts filled with love? Have we the Spirit of God dwelling in us? And is that spirit leading us? Then says the Word, we are the sons of God, or children of God. We must be like our blessed master (Christ) in this life if we ever have that eternal life which God offers to give to them that have faith in his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. May all the dear brethren and sisters have a faith that works by love, purifies the heart, which we must have in order to be ready for his second coming.

The meeting at West Point, I think, will do much good in that place. We had large congregations most of the time, and a good interest to hear. We think that good results will come from the meeting. Bro. Hurd was to continue the meetings. Four were baptised, and we hope by the blessing of God that Bro. Hurd may be blessed in his labors in the future as he has been with this people in the past. Bro. L. Scott has been preaching near this place for many years, and is still doing all he can. I had to leave too soon. It takes much longer to get the church to work now, than it did a few years in the past. I commence a meeting to-night, a short distance out of Springfield. May the Lord give victory on the side of truth.

JOTTINGS BY THE WAY.

Aug. 17th. Heard Eld. Israel Dammon preach in the Advent Chapel in Portsmouth, and had the great privilege of meeting with the wife of Robert Foster, formerly Editor of the Christain Herald, once printed in this town. He was a most worthy man, a true and dear friend of my parents, and though so many years have flown with their crowd of cares and incidents, yet they have failed to efface from my mind pleasant memories of the kindness and geniality of his manners. "Truly the memory of the just is blessed. It was in Robert Foster's house, that dear wife of his kneeling by my side, that I first found the Saviour. As I wandered up and down this old town, what thrilling memories stirred my soul—the narrow streets, the houses built so close to the street; the air of age that seemed to hang over the streets, the houses, the wharves, the mossy grave yards, all in such strange contrast with our western cities, with numerous things and incidents, brought back with vividness the days of my early youth, when but a girl I was taught in these halls of learning, and wandered up and down these quaint old streets. Well, the Saviour I found then and there in that old seaport town, has never left me, but through dangers great and sorrows deep, through toil and perplexity, temptation and trial, he has been the same faithful friend, sticking closer than a brother. Blessed be his precious name now and forever more.

While in Portsmouth, was kindly entertained at the home of brother and sister Chase, precious pilgrims journeying to the land of promise. God bless them.

Aug. 21. Left Kittery and crossed again the noble Piscataqua river which caused so much admiration in my young heart, as I first gazed upon it in the days of my girlhood, and which now stirred deep and thrilling memories, as I gazed upon the surface of its beautiful waters rolling on, ever on, to mingle with the waves of the salt sea.

Passing through Newburyport, and other old towns that seemed much after the same pattern with Portsmouth, we continued to be whirled onward by the iron horse, rushing by farm house and village, orchard and meadow—towns of thousands of inhabitants so near together, you wondered how they managed to feed themselves, rocky pastures, and broad salt marshes bordering on the ocean, with occasional glimpses of old Ocean itself, majestic and grand as when I last gazed upon its billowy deep long time ago, and at last came to a stop in Boston, that famous city of the Puritans.

Arriving in Boston in the midst of a drizzling rain, but found warm-hearted friends at the depot, who took me at once under their charge, and while I remained in the city, took especial care that I should want no good thing. Happy and full of interest were the hours passed in Boston, threading its different streets, promenading its beautiful Common, sitting under the shadow of its majestic trees, feeding its bright eyed sparrows, lingering by the grand old English elm of time honored memories, and showing in its massive form, the touch of Time's effacing fingers, standing by Brewer's fountain and gazing at the bronze group of old Neptune and his sea nymphs, &c., &c.

The city gardens detained us with their floral beauties and fragrance, while we admired the taste exhibed in the arrangement of trees, shrubs, plants, colors, sizes, walks and every things that tended to help make up the beauty of the entire grounds. Led the black and white swans sailing so gracefully on the bosom of the water; saw the orange tree with its green leaf and yellow fruit grown in a northern clime, studied its statues and turned our feet reluctantly from its pleasant walks, to the crowded thoroughfares of the city.

As our eyes feasted upon these varied beauties, and we lingered loth to leave their verdure and bloom, our mind reverted to that beautiful home on the New Earth, of whose magnificent gardens, he who is the great, the supreme artist, he who is the author and perfecter of beauty, shall not only order all the arrangements, but to whom he shall put the finishing touch, when he shall set his hand to beautify the home of the redeemed. Truly "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what God hath laid up for those that love him." But he hath revealed it; yes, he hath given us faint glimpses of the great beauty and joy in store for the redeemed, and before these glimpses, these bright anticipations, all earthly beauty and joy pale as the light of the stars of night pale before the brilliant glory of the rising sun.

We passed up the granite steps of the State House between the statues of the Lion headed Daniel Webster, and the great champion of reform in public schools and friend of Teachers Institutes. As I passed by his statue I thought of the time when he entered a town to hold an Institute, and found that a man had been there with a monkey show and attracted large attention. Fathers, mothers and children, all being interested in seeing the monkey show, but when Mann with all of his ability and deep interest for their children, came among them to look after their education and proper development, no one seemed interested He had to go himself and get the broom and sweep, with his own hands, the hall in which this Institute was to be held. Said a friend to him, "if these people whom this Institute concerns so deeply, have no interest to come or do for themselves, why should you be so fretful and interested for them?" "If they are careless and not interested" said Mann "there is more need that I should be." Ah! thought I how truly this applies to those who love and speak of the second coming of Christ, When men whose eternal interests are at stake, pass by this great truth, and would sooner go to a circus a monkey show, or to hear the negro minstrels, than to hear those who proclaim this great message, it should never dishearten us. If men are cold, or lukewarm, and disinterested on this great subject, how much more important that we should be interested, and stir them up on this all-important question. God give us the spirit of consecration, and unfaltering trust, that shall stimulate us to a willingness to do and suffer for Christ.

"Dare to be right—dare to be true;
"We have a work that none other can do:
"Do it so bravely, so wisely, so well,
"As to gladden all heaven' and Christ shall say well."

The ascent to the cupola of the State House was wearisome, but the view from its summit is most interesting. As you looked down upon Boston, spread out beneath and all around, this great commercial mart, this large city by the sea with its moving mass of men, women and children, its rows of uniform brick dewlling houses, its stately brown stone fronts, and its miserable homes in North street, and other streets in that section, its great mercantile houses, its stock of merchandise, its hospitals, its custom houses, its splendid temples, some erected to the worship of God, and some to the worship of Mammon, its moss-grown graves by the side of ancient houses of prayer, its great chains of railway centering here, its splendid ships that go out to sea and do business in great waters, its wicked, depressed, licentious, heaven, daring men, whose thoughts are evil, only evil, and that continually, its mighty men of intellect, of purity, of goodness and of wealth—stewards of God, whose left hand knoweth not what the right hand doeth, but who not only feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick, comfort the afflicted, raise the down trodden and fallen, but stand up in the halls of legislation, and any where and every where they can make a stand or cast an influence for the right. Fallen women by thousands of different grades, some in their elegant carriages, clothed in silk and velvet, and fine linen, rolling through the streets, others with poverty stricken forms, and haggard faces lingering around the corners, or pacing the streets of the vilest portion of the city, "whose houses are alike the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death."

Women, pure and good, angels of mercy among wickedness, vice and misery around them dispensing kindness and love. Women mighty in intellect, strong in purpose, effectual in working, loved for their goodness and reverenced for their chastity, and true nobility of life—all this, and more than this, spread out in one grand panorama beneath and around you, fill your mind with conflicting thoughts.

O, God of mercy and of le[illegible] down from thy bright and beautiful heaven upon this mingling, surging mass of human beings, bring them to holy resolutions and works of love, thy consecrated ones, and devise in thy great good mind some way to reach these poor sin bound wretches, or raise, one united cry in the breast of every saint of "Come Lord Jesus and come quickly."

Christian Sorrow.

Christian fidelity does not always bring unmixed sunshine. Sorrows, crushing griefs, sore disappointments, sufferings, make a large portion of Christian experience. The Word says that "in the world ye have tribulation," that if we "suffer with Christ we shall also reign with him," and it is mentioned that we are to "fill up the sufferings of Christ" which remain, as a part of our legitimate work. This seems strange to casual observers. They cannot understand it. It seems as if the better one becomes the less he should suffer. When a great sorrow comes upon saints, they are often amazed and bewildered. They ask,—"What does it mean? Why should I be so afflicted? What have I done that the Lord should punish me thus?" It is very difficult for them to feel that all is done in kindness, that the dark cloud is laden with mercy, that grief comes to prepare the way for joy. Not a few Christians have been plunged into trials, when it seemed almost impossible to say from the heart, "Thy will be done." We recollect a devoted saint, whose heart was bleeding in anguish, and the best he could do was to cry out,—"I hope that I shall feel that it is all for the best." He did soon feel it, but in the hour of darkness he could not. And his almost despair was not sin, for he held fast to the promises, though he could not realize nor feel their precious certainty. It is easy to trust when all is prosperous; it requires much higher faith and more spiritual heroism to heed the Scripture,—"Let him who walketh in darkness and hath no light, trust in the Lord and stay upon his God;" and so the Saviour regards it. There is no integrity like that which refuses to yield, but stands firm when the very foundations of hope are obscured, and there seems to be nothing real and substantial which we can grasp.

Jesus found the path of duty flooded with sorrow, and why should not we? The highest Christian conquests are reached through deep mortifications and disappointments. The shame of overthrow to our plans is often necessary to our real success. Our greatest failures are often but steps to still greater successes. But we do not always know success when it arrives. What seems a misfortune is often real fortune.

Of one thing we may be certain, that the richest blessings come to us through the gates of sorrow. It is impossible for us to receive the choicest and sweetest consolations of grace, until we are driven to extremes. When pushed to the agony of despair, when floundering in the very heart of midnight, we feel the need and appreciate the value of light, help, deliverance, as we could never do but for the sore trial. And we can never fully enjoy a blessing until we appreciate in full our need of it. So our experiences grow richer, deeper, broader and more perfect "through sufferings," than is possible in any way. We don't know what a Saviour we have until we fully see our need of one; the wonderful resources of grace can never be learned without Northern Illinois Conference Report.

The annual Conference met in connection with the camp meeting at Wyanet, Sept. 5.

Officers elected for the ensuing year, were as follows:

The churches, so far as heard from were generally in prosperous condition. Some new churches have been formed during past year Four new ones were received into the Conference—Mineral, Oneida, Carol and Broughton. The "ministers' reports" were cheering in many respects. They spoke of an ear to hear such as has not been before in this state. The truth is taking deep hold on many hearts, and the great lack is for faithful men to go out and proclaim it. The following preach-brethren were heard from, either by letter or in person: A. Bailey, F. Burr, E. H. Burrington, A. Cairns, D. S. Clark, L. F. Cole, L. H. Davis, A. A. Crocker, J. Drain, R. P. Hoge, A. C. Kingsley, (deceased), S. E Mabey, C. C. Marston, A. Lathrop, H. G. McCulloch, M. McCulloch, W. McCulloch, E. Royce, C. W. Smith, N. W. Spencer, H. Willet, C. W. Russell, J. H. Williams, T. G. Baxter, Srs. J. A. McCulloch, S. E. Finn and A. E. Rathbun.

A resolution was adopted expressing the need of a state Evangelist; and brother C. C. Marston, of Elida, Illinois, was appointed to said work—he being sustained by the voluntary contributions of the people where he may labor.

The subject of the publishing interest in the West was considerably agitated, and resolution was adopted declaring the Conference in sympathy with the purposes and work of the Western Association.

Encouraging reports were received from Neponset, Yorktown and DeKalb quarterly Conferences. Have had blessed meetings with increasing interest. Voted that the action of Neponset quarterly Conference in ordaining brother H. Willet to the ministry, was approved by this Conference.

Brother H. M. Goff was voted a preacher's license.

Brother F. Burr having moved to Ohio, was released from his membership in this Conference, at his own request. The prayers and kind wishes of the brethren, go with him, although no official action was taken.

1. Having ascertained the number of members in the church, and the probable amount to be raised, let an apportionment be made among the members "as the Lord hath prospered them."

2. That each member lay by him in store, on "the first day of each week" the necessary amount, and pay it into the hands of the treasurer who shall keep an account of the same, and also the amount by him paid out, stating the purpose for which it was paid

3. That the treasurer pay over to the preacher once a month, but not later than once a quarter, the amount due; the balance if any there be, to be appropriated at the discretion of the church.

4. That the deacon take charge of this matter, present the resolution and receive the name of each brother or sister with the amount they feel able to pay. If necessary the church may appoint a brother or sister for an assistant.

Women, pure and good, angels of mercy among wickedness, vice and misery around them dispensing kindness and love. Women mighty in intellect, strong in purpose, effectual in working, loved for their goodness and reverenced for their chastity, and true nobility of life—all this, and more than this, spread out in one grand panorama beneath and around you, fill your mind with conflicting thoughts.

O, God of mercy and of lov[illegible] down from thy bright and beautiful heaven upon this mingling, surging mass of human beings, bring them to holy resolutions and works of love, thy consecrated ones, and devise in thy great good mind some way to reach these poor sin bound wretches, or raise, one united cry in the breast of every saint of "Come Lord Jesus and come quickly."

Christian Sorrow.

Christian fidelity does not always bring unmixed sunshine. Sorrows, crushing griefs, sore disappointments, sufferings, make a large portion of Christian experience. The Word says that "in the world ye have tribulation," that if we "suffer with Christ we shall also reign with him," and it is mentioned that we are to "fill up the sufferings of Christ" which remain, as a part of our legitimate work. This seems strange to casual observers. They cannot understand it. It seems as if the better one becomes the less he should suffer. When a great sorrow comes upon saints, they are often amazed and bewildered. They ask,—"What does it mean? Why should I be so afflicted? What have I done that the Lord should punish me thus?" It is very difficult for them to feel that all is done in kindness, that the dark cloud is laden with mercy, that grief comes to prepare the way for joy. Not a few Christians have been plunged into trials, when it seemed almost impossible to say from the heart, "Thy will be done." We recollect a devoted saint, whose heart was bleeding in anguish, and the best he could do was to cry out,—"I hope that I shall feel that it is all for the best." He did soon feel it, but in the hour of darkness he could not. And his almost despair was not sin, for he held fast to the promises, though he could not realize nor feel their precious certainty. It is easy to trust when all is prosperous; it requires much higher faith and more spiritual heroism to heed the Scripture,—"Let him who walketh in darkness and hath no light, trust in the Lord and stay upon his God;" and so the Saviour regards it. There is no integrity like that which refuses to yield, but stands firm when the very foundations of hope are obscured, and there seems to be nothing real and substantial which we can grasp.

Jesus found the path of duty flooded with sorrow, and why should not we? The highest Christian conquests are reached through deep mortifications and disappointments. The shame of overthrow to our plans is often necessary to our real success. Our greatest failures are often but steps to still greater successes. But we do not always know success when it arrives. What seems a misfortune is often real fortune.

Of one thing we may be certain, that the richest blessings come to us through the gates of sorrow. It is impossible for us to receive the choicest and sweetest consolations of grace, until we are driven to extremes. When pushed to the agony of despair, when floundering in the very heart of midnight, we feel the need and appreciate the value of light, help, deliverance, as we could never do but for the sore trial. And we can never fully enjoy a blessing until we appreciate in full our need of it. So our experiences grow richer, deeper, broader and more perfect "through sufferings," than is possible in any way. We don't know what a Saviour we have until we fully see our need of one; the wonderful resources of grace can never be learned without ltiplying forms of want; wounds ke it possible to demonstrate the tues of the "oil of gladness."

We are "monuments of grace," tnesses to the fulness of the great vation, in our diverse experiences. rist desires to develop the capacity the gospel to meet every human at, heal every wound. He uses sor- , misfortune, every form of trial, increase the moral wealth, the joy l excellence of the spirit life. Are willing to be thus used for Christ? we are called to show how grace stains a bereaved heart, are we will- to be bereaved? Jesus calls for rep- entations of the measure of grace to poor, to the disappointed, the unfor- nate, the weak, the maligned, the per- cuted, the sick, the care worn invalid, discouraged, to sufferers of all pos- le calamities; have we the heart, the ility and courage to accept our lot, l show how a Christian can meet, ar up under, overcome, and profit by trials which are upon us? Some nplain that they are so situated that y can do no good. None are thus uated. If they show how a Christian find comfort, hope, exercise pa nce, and cherish love and courage, their peculiar position, they do a eat work. The world needs such timony; sinners need to see such ses, where grace has well subdued carnal passions and developed the age of Jesus; Christians need such amples

The whole gospel, in its wonderful ness, its adaption to every situation l want, sorrow and responsibility, not be brought out without these amples, and we individually cannot ain the ripest Christian experience thout them. So then let us rejoice in ictions, and if the heart is too sad for , if the sorrow is so deep that we not quite say, "Though he slay , yet I will trust in him," let us at st bow our heads in reverence, and idst tears of anguish, say as clearly as sible,—"I will hope in thy mercy." Morning Star.

The Hope of Israel Centres in the Resurrection.

That Abraham had the promise of a ed in whom all nations shall be ssed, is admitted; and that seed is rist, by the record, (Gal. 3. 16). at Abraham had the promise of the th for an everlasting possession, and t the same promise was made to ac and Jacob, and confined by the h of God to each of them individu- , may be seen at one glance in . 105: 9–12, and studied at leisure many parts of Scripture. "This mise, which was made unto the ers, God hath fulfilled the same, in t he hath raised up Jesus again" Acts 13: 33.) He will also fulfill same unto us, their children, and to the brethren of Christ, "at his ap- ring and his kingdom." These ers did not have their promised session of inheritance in this world dwelt strangers and pilgrims in the th through life, and died in the hope oming into the possession in a bet- resurrection—(Acts 7: 5; Heb. 11.) these fathers the King has said, any shall come from the east and t, and shall sit down with Abraham Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom eaven—(Matt. 8: 11.) These fathers then people of the kingdom, and ir fellow-citizens out of all nations to be gathered with them. "For s saith the Lord God, Behold, O people, I will open your graves, and use you to come out of your graves, bring you into the land of Israel" ek. 37: 12); "their own land"— e land that I have given unto Jacob, servant, wherein your fathers have elt"—Ezek. 37: 25.).

n short, wherever and whenever aham and Paul, Israel and the lve tribes received their promised ritance of everlasting possession Christ Jesus, the entire people he realm will receive theirs also. Theirs lies in the resurrection. So must the inheritance promised to all people also lie wholly beyond the grave; not on this side a part, and a part on that side. The entire possession lies in the land of the living rescued from the curse, and has no place in this land of the dead and dying. It is absurd to claim and maintain the right of the children of Abraham, as his heirs, to the possession of a country he neither owned nor claimed, nor "so much as set his foot on."–(Acts 7: 2.) The King himself is waiting in glory for the prostration and the expulsion of the enemy from the purchased realm; the fathers of faith in all past ages are waiting in joyful vision of the glory which shall be revealed in the last time; the children of God by faith are steadfastly "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing" of hoerkomenos, the coming heavenly King with myriads of his saints, to give them the kingdom, while the carnal seed stand firm on the ground "that they are the rightful heirs, for they murdered the true heir that they might seize on his inheritance." This is bold but not successful.

This living truth runs through all Scripture—viz, that Israel, the chosen people of the heavenly kingdom, shall be scattered, and not lost; they shall be gathered and restored to their own land. That Judah shall go into captivity among all nations and become a byword and reproach, and the whole land shall be desolate, and yet saith the Lord, "If ye thoroughly amend your ways and your doings,....then I will cause you (not your posterity) to dwell in this place, in the land that I gave to your fathers forever and ever' [illegible] 7: 5, 7.) The patient in his life [illegible] are to inherit their fatherland in eternal life. For the scattered and captured ones shall be assembled under the banner of Messiah, their King, and at his summons they shall return from their graves and come to their fatherland in eternal life, "a land flowing with milk and honey, the glory of all lands" (Ezek. 20: 6) (where they shall never more see trouble, nor war, nor dispossession, nor captivity, nor enemy) —(Ezek.36: 37; Isa. 12: 66; 2 Sam. 7:10.) Their sins shall be cleansed and their iniquities shall be remembered no more; their reproach shall be taken away, and their "desolate land become like the garden of Eden"—(Ezek. 36: 35; Jer. 21: 34; Rom. 11: 27; Heb. 8: 12.) The same gospel to the people of the kingdom runs through the New Testament in Jesus and the resurrection—i. e., the reproach of the cross and the captivity of death belong to this world, and the crown of the coming kingdom in glory forever belongs with Christ the Lord our King in the new creation.

This dispersion of Isreal and their triumphant return from the land of of their captivity, to dwell in peace forever in their fatherland, is the burden of the prophets and the inspiration of the Psalms and the end of the Gospel.

What, then, is their fatherland—that which Abraham and Isaac and Jacob did not possess? or that promised them, which they sought through life and which they shall in the resurrection enjoy forever?

It could not be the land they did not possess; therefore it must be the better country which they received by faith in the promise and saw afar off, and shall yet inherit in the coming reign of God on earth.

How can these holy people, scattered over the face of the earth, be gathered into that ruined country in this sinful world? Never! How can the scattered be gathered unless the very same scattered ones be also the gathered ones? For the Scripture does not say, I will scatter one generation and gather other generations, but "I will scatter you" (Lev. 26; 33) and "gather you" (Jer. 56: 14). The doctrine of the resurrection solves the mystery; it is the common sense of the Bible.—Senior Harvard's Gospel of the Kingdom.'

Our Young Folks.

Mother's Growing Old.

Her step is slow and weary;
  Her hands unsteady now,
And paler still and deeper
  The lines upon her brow;
Her meek blue eye has faded;
  Her hair has lost its gold;
Her once firm voice now falters—
  My mother's growing old.

Her days of strength are over;
  Her earthly joys depart.
But peace and holy beauty
  Are shining in her heart;
The links that bind her spirit
  Relax their trembling hold;
She soon will be an angel—
  Sweet mother's growing old.

My thoughts flow back to childhood,
  When fondled on her knee,
I poured out all my sorrows,
  Or lisped my songs of glee;
But now upon me leaning
  So wearily and cold,
With trembling lips she murmurs,
  "Dear child, I'm growing old."

I think of all her counsels,
  So precious to my youth;
How faithfully she taught me
  God's sacred words of truth;
How tenderly she led me
  To Jesus' blessed fold,
Where she will soon be welcomed,
  No longer bowed and old.

The path of daily duty
  Was ever her delight,
She walked by Faith and Patience,
  And trusted God for sight.
Her hands with useful labor
  Each day their mission told;
Her deeds like heavenly roses,
  Still bloom though she is old.

Alas, those hands so skillful,
  Which toiled with loving grace
To make me blessed with comforts,
  And home a happy place;
Those dear hands pale and wrinkled,
  Are now by time controlled,
They rest in prayerful quiet—
  Dear mother's growing old.

Yet, though her earthly temple
  Fast falleth day by day,
Her soul with faith increasing,
  Pursues its heavenward way;
And when the mists of Jordan
  Shall from her sight be rolled
She'll shine in youth and beauty
  Where spirits ne'er grow old.

O mother, fond and faithful,
  Thou truest earthly friend,
May I be near to soothe thee
  Till all thy struggles end.
And while with sad heart yearning
  Thy form my arms enfold,
I pray in peace to meet thee
  Where saints no more grow old.

Bible Stories for Children.

UNCLE SIMEON.

(JEREMIAH.)

Jeremiah was the son of a priest named Hilkiah, who lived about three miles north of Jerusalem, in Anathoth, a town principally inhabited by priests. The name Jeremiah means "the appointed of the Lord;" and he was chosen by the Lord, while very young, to be a prophet. He told the Lord he was only a child, and tried to excuse himself on account of his age. But the people who lived in Canaan had become very wicked, nearly forgetting their God, and Jeremiah was selected to stand boldly before them, to tell them of their wickedness, and if they would not turn away, to prophesy to them what would be their punishment. So the Lord told Jeremiah that he would give him boldness and strength to stand before the wicked kings and princes of his people.

He faithfully done the work that the Lord told him to do, and stood in the gateway at Jerusalem, and warned the people what would be their doom if they did not keep the commandments of the law. He suffered much persecution and bad treatment, and was often in danger of losing his life. Once when he had declared that the kingdom of Judah and the city of Jerusalem should become desolate, Pashur, the priest who was in charge of the temple, became so enraged, abused the young prophet, and had him bound and placed in a public place. He told this wicked priest that his family would all be carried captives into Babylon, and that he himself should die a captive in that land.

When he had been prophesying nearly twenty years, and the people would not heed what he said, he made yokes of wood and sent one to each o the nations of Canaan as a token of their future bondage and servitude to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. King Jehoiakim sent for the roll containing the prophecies against the nations, and when they were being read he became very mad, seized the roll and, after cutting it with a knife, threw it into the fire, where it was burned up. He then ordered Jeremiah and his scribe, Baruch, to be put to death. But the Lord did not let them be taken, but ordered the prophet to have his scribe write out another copy of the roll and add to it other prediction of the unhappy death of Jehoiakim, all of which were afterward fulfilled, the story of which is too long to tell here, so turn to Jeremiah the 22d chapter, and read it at your leisure.

During the forty years of prophesying, this bold man of God was constantly in prison, in dungeons, in stocks, and being tortured by the wicked people because of the truthfulness of his predictions against them. But he always advised them, pleaded with them to turn and obey the Lord and keep his commands, that these calamities might not come upon them, And when they were carried away captives into Egypt he cheered them, telling them to live good lives, and keep the law; that there would be a deliverance, a joyful time in the future, when they should prosper and be happy.

The Little Maid and the Two Prayers.

A GOOD Scotch minister put up at a country inn. He called the whole family together for worship. Among them was a poor little scullery maid, very ignorant and very dirty. The good minister said to her:

"Who made you?"

"Don't know."

Have you a soul?"

"Don't know; what is a soul?"

The minister talked more with her, and when he went away, told her he was going to Edinboro, and would bring her a present on his return if she would say a little prayer, which he would teach her, every morning and evening. She assented. This is the prayer:—

"O Lord, show me myself."

"The minister was gone a fortnight. On his return he inquired for the little maid. She was in great distress of mind.

"Have you said the prayer as you agreed?"

"Oh! yes, sir: yes, sir; and God has answered it; and oh, what a sight I have seen!"

The poor little maid had seen herself a sinner before God; her soul could not rest.

The minister gave her the present and then said:—

"Now I want you to say another little prayer. This is it: "Oh Lord, show me thyself."

The good man went his way. Years afterward, when he was old and gray-headed, a lady called to see him.

"Do you remember the little scullery maid?

"Oh, yes, yes."

"Well said the lady, "I am the little maid. The two prayers you taught me were the means of saving my soul."

How like the woman of Samaria! First Jesus showed himself to her, and she found no rest in the vision. Then he showed himself, and she ran with joy to the city, saying, "Come, see."

O Lord, show me myself.
O Lord, show me thyself.

ADAMS. Fell asleep in Jesus, at Monticello Aug. 14, 1873, Lorin C., son of Br. and Sr. Samuel H. and Augusta Adams. Aged about 2 years and six months.

Little Lorin was a great sufferer for many months, but he rests in peace, and soon will come forth in a healthy world to enjoy eternal life. The funeral was attended by the writer. S. C. WELLCOME.

SMITH.—Fell asleep in Jesus, at Clearwater, Minn., at the residence of I. F. Fuller, Aug. 23, 1873, Sister Bethiah Smith wife of Br. John U. Smith. Aged, 60 years and 4 months.

Sr. Smith had suffered much for many years from disease, being of a feeble constitution, and at last was laid low by a stroke of paralysis, and died in the triumph of faith. Br. and Sr. Smith formerly lived in Monticello, but moved north to Otter Tail Co., some two or three years ago; but during the summer, on account of her failing health, they returned to St. Cloud where she has stopped with her daughter, until just before her death. She desired to return to Monticello to be with her old friends again, but on arriving at Clearwater was taken worse, died, and by her request before her death, was brought to the house of Br. S. Wilder, her old and tried friends, to be buried, and was accompanied by her husband and three daughters who had left their homes in distant towns, and during her last sickness waited upon and consoled her during her last struggles, and then lingered around her precious form until she was conveyed to her resting place in the Monticello grave yard.

She was truly a pilgrim on the earth, beloved by all who knew her. She had been a Christian from her youth; but at the time of the tent meeting in Monticello in 1867 by Br. and Sr. Reed and Br. and Sr. Fasset, she and her husband embraced the truth of the soon coming Saviour and immortality through him, and have since rejoiced in the hope, and as she neared the grave, her faith failed not, and she was often heard to express her deep love for the Saviour and glory in the prospect of reigning with him in his coming kingdom. She left a large family of children, (most of them married,) who loved their mother dearly, and done all in their power during her life time to make her happy. God bless them and help them to trust in their mother's God, that they may meet her in the better land where parting is known no more. Br. S. is left lonely and sad, but he rejoices in the same faith of his dear companion who now sleeps in Jesus, expecting to meet her again when he comes.

The funeral was held at the house of Br. and Sr. Wilder, whom she dearly loved during her life time, and to a large circle of mourners and sympathizing friends. The writer spoke from 1 Thes. 4: 18. It was a solemn season, and we hope many were comforted by the words of Paul, and may many more be led to prepare for that rest that remains for God's dear people.

S. C. WELLCOME.

Poetry.

Jesus Loves Even Me.

SELECTED, WITH ADDITIONS, BY ELD. GEO. THOMSON.

I.
I am so glad that our Father in heaven,
Tells of his love in the Book he has given:
Wonderful things in the Bible I see,
But this is the dearest, that Jesus loves me,

CHORUS.
I am so glad that Jesus loves me,
Jesus loves me, Jesus loves me.
I am so glad that Jesus loves me,
Jesus loves even me.

II.
Why should He look on a rebel like me,
Granting a pardon so full and so free?
Well might we wonder that such things could be,
Only that Jesus in mercy loves me.

CHORUS.
I am so glad, &c.,

III.
Now since He loves me, I'll try to obey,
Love Him, and serve Him, and please Him each day:
Living so all my dear neighbors may see,
How I love Jesus, and Jesus loves me.

CHORUS.
I am so glad, &c.,

IV.
Though I forget him and wander away,
Kindly he follows wherever I stray;
Back to his dear loving arms would I flee,
When I remember that Jesus loves me.

CHORUS.
I am so glad, &c.,

V.
I know He will keep me in hope while I sleep,
And kindly watch o'er me, though others may weep;
And on that bright morn when the shadows all flee,
I'll wake in his likeness, because he loves me.

CHORUS.
I am so glad, &c.,

VI.
Oh if there's only one song I can sing,
When in his beauty I see the great King;
This shall my song in eternity be,
Oh! what a wonder that Jesus loves me.

CHORUS.
I am so glad, &c.,

The Voice from Patmos to the Churches.

"I John, who also am your brother, and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great noise, as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: and, What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia, unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea."—Rev 1: 9–11.

The voice of the Master ceases, and that of the disciple begins again. He does not call himself "the disciple whom Jesus loved," as he does elsewhere, but simply 'John.' And as another Apostle writes, 'I Paul,' so he does here, 'I John,'—that is, 'I who am that very John whom ye have known; who have been among and cared for you as an apostle and shepherd,—I now write to you.' He calls himself by the following names:

I. Brother and Companion.—He does not write as a lord over them, or as Diotrephes, wishing to have preeminence, but as one of themselves. He is one of the many 'brethren' in Asia; one of the 'household of faith;' a son of the same father; a member of the one family. He is no stranger or distant relative, no master or ruler, but truly a part of themselves, who needed their sympathy and love even more than they did his. Not a brother only, but a 'companion;' a copartner with them in all things; a sharer with them in the same faith and hope, the same sorrow and joy. 'Brother and companion!' how comfortably must these words have sounded in their ears! how well fitted to remove suspicion or resistance in regard to the reproofs and warnings about to be conveyed! Such a one was not likely to speak unkindly, or rebuke without a cause; or expose faults with any feeling save that of affection and earnest longing for their welfare. Not to wound, but to soothe and bless, would be his motive and desire.

II. Brother and companion in tribulation.—There was tribulation in the Churches then, as now; in some cases it was 'much tribulation' (Acts. 14: 22), or 'great tribulation' (Rev. 2:22; 7:14), 'Weeping endured for a night' (Ps. 30:5); for this is the night, and it is the time of tears. The church, the injured widow, waters her couch with her tears, and will do so until the morning dawn, and the day of the wiping away of all tears arrive. What John suffered, these churches suffered; what they suffered, he suffered: for the sympathy between all the members of the body was quick and instantaneous in these days of love. They felt for each other; they bore each other's burdens; they shared each other's griefs and joys. John could say with Paul, 'Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended and I burn not?' (2 Cor. 11:29.) The 'communion of saints' was understood then more fully then ever since. For sympathy between the members of Christ's body is little known in these last days; so many things have come between; so many non-conducting materials have prevented the communication. The world has come in; false brethren have come in; the members do not realize the vitality of their connection with the Head. Life has gone out; love has sunk low; and thus the thrill of sympathy which went once through the body when one suffered is no longer felt. The links are broken; the fine nerves that carried the spiritual feeling through every part have frozen or become insensible, if not dead. Who of us appreciates this deep, true spiritual union, with which no external unity can intermeddle, either to hinder or to help? It is the union of life and love; of faith, and truth, and hope. It is a unity of joy and peace; a unity to which nothing earthly can be compared; a unity altogether heavenly and divine.

III. Brother and companion in the kingdom.—The kingdom belongs alike to all the members of the one body from the beginning; and the apostle, in the eleventh of the Hebrews, gives us a few of the names of these 'joint heirs,' these co partners in the coming glory. It is an inheritance in light, and each has the whole of it, as each dweller on the earth has the whole sun as his. A common faith, a common hope; a common exile, and a common kingdom! One in sorrow, one in joy; one in shame, one in glory; one in tribulation, one in triumph! It is a kingdom that is before his eyes, and before theirs; a kingdom which had not yet come; the kingdom of the saints; the everlasting kingdom, the kingdom which can not be moved. 'Kings and priests unto God' is the common name of all the saints, from Abel downward; 'We shall reign on the earth,' is their unceasing song. Even in exile, and persecution, and sorrow, they anticipate their crowns. From desolate Patmos, the eye of John beholds the glory in which all this shame and banishment are to end.

IV. Brother and companion in the patience of Jesus Christ.—Until that kingdom come, there is need of patience such as all the saints have shown in the days of their pilgrimage; the patience exhibited by the Master himself; the patience of faith and hope; the patient waiting for the kingdom. Truly they 'have need of patience.'

Often is 'the patience of the saints' dwelt upon. 'He that endureth (is patient) to the end,' says the Lord himself; and again, 'In your patience possess ye your souls.' Take also the following passages: 'Tribulation worketh patience' (Rom. 5: 3); with patience we wait for it' (Rom. 8: 25); 'the God of patience' (Rom. 15: 5); patience in tribulation' (Rom. 12:12); 'if we suffer (literally, if we are patient), we shall also reign with him' (2 Tim. 2:12); 'let us run with patience' (Heb. 12:1). The churches of Asia, and the whole church of God, are called upon to this patient waiting for the kingdom, and yet to be 'looking for and hasting unto the coming day of God.' Be patient unto the coming of the Lord. Be patient under wrong, and suffering, and weariness, and hope deferred! Fret not! He that believeth doth not make haste; the Lord is at hand; the kingdom is about to come; the tribulation will soon cease; the joy will soon begin; and once begun, it will never end. The 'everlasting joy upon our heads' will compensate for the ages of patience through which the church has had to pass on her way to the kingdom.

All this John knew from present experience. He was in the isle that is called Patmos, a banished, lonely man; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed. It was for the Master's sake that he was in exile. Faithful to 'the word of God, and to the testimony of Jesus Christ,' he was made to know what great things he must suffer for his beloved Lord. He was now the last of the apostles, as his brother James had been the first to go, and he could not but feel his loneliness in his extreme old age.

But he is not alone, for the Father is with him, and the Master too. 'I was' (was 'made to be,' or 'became,' egenomen) 'in the spirit on the Lord's day.'* One Lord's day he was in the spirit,—not exactly at first, like Paul, caught up to the third heaven (though afterwards he was summoned up, ch. 4: 1), but still so 'filled with the Spirit,' so 'in the Spirit,' that the invisible things of God were revealed to him. In 'the visions of God' he saw what was coming on the earth. 'The secret of the Lord was with him.' The kingdom and the glory, for which he was suffering banishment, came up before his view. Thus God sustains his own. He comes to them in exile, and compasses them about with deliverance. He opens heaven, and descends to keep them company in their solitude, making them forget their sorrow and their exile.

Let us live near him; walking with him in simple faith; tasting his love; and enjoying his sympathy. He is with his own here, and his own will ere long be with him where he is. 'Lo, I am WITH YOU,' is his promise to us now; so shall they ever be WITH THE LORD,' is the consummation of that promise in the coming glory.

He hears what mortal ears could not take in, 'a great voice, as of a trumpet.' That voice is his Lord's. It repeats the word already spoken concerning Himself, 'I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last,' that John might be reminded of the glory of the speaker. And then it is added, 'what thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia.' Thus the things seen are for these seven Churches, as well as the things that are heard. This whole book of the Revelation was not only for the church of these last days, but for the church of the first day as well. The Lord speaks to the whole church, and summons it to hear. These seven representative Churches get the message first, and from them it goes forth to all. Jesus is speaking still. 'The great voice as of a trumpet' has sounded through the ages, and it is sounding still; nor will it cease till He whose voice it is has arrived to introduce the consummation and glory for which we are waiting.—Bonar's Bible Thoughts and Themes.

*For the meaning of this expression, see Num. 11: 26; Ezek. 3; 3; 8: 13, 14; Matt. 22: 43; 1 Cor. 14: 2; Rev. 4: 2. The expression 'the Lord's day' is the first day of the week, not the day of Christ's coming,—that is expressed differently.

"As Becometh Saints."

"Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children; and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savor. But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints; neither filthiness; nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient; but rather giving of thanks." —Eph. 5: 1–4.

"The world," in the times of the awakenings that visited so many parts of the land, raised loud outcries against excitement and late hours, and the too familiar mixing and conversing together of young men and young women. Now, for my part, I think they did good service; and if Christianity had viewed the matter correctly, they would have said, "Perhaps there may be some truth in what 'the world' says; at least we will consider their outcry as the barking of God's watchdog to put us in fear of danger, and make us look to ourselves that we lose not the things wrought, but receive a full reward."

I remember being deeply grieved at the close of a meeting, by seeing a young man of very ardent temperament and deep-flowing affectionateness, put his hand on a young woman's shoulder as he conversed with her about her soul. He was a very affectionate preacher, and touched the feelings; and now, by actually touching the persons affected, I fear it might tend to a very bad end; that instead of the truth and Spirit of God working to produce conversion, mere natural affection would work, and attachment to the preacher would result, and the poor souls might mistake this for union to Christ to their eternal undoing. I spoke to him after the meeting was over, and he saw his mistake at once, and confessed his error, and expressed his thankfulness to me for pointing it out, and said he would avoid it. He has been the means of the conversion of many hundreds, and when I see reports of the results of his meetings, I have all the more confidence in them that I know that for many years he has not put his hands on the shoulders of anxious souls.

"The world" judges from what it would naturally feel and do in like circumstances, and as there is always great danger of excitement running into the fleshly condition in which the world is, however much people may begin in the Spirit, there is great need of care and caution lest they should end in the flesh. There is just an hair's breadth between walking in love with Christians and walking in lust, and hence I believe we have them here in juxtaposition; and it is dangerous to underrate the powers of our enemies and get off our guard, for that is the moment when the ever-watchful devil may shift the points on the narrow way, and then the greater the speed at which the train is proceeding the more tremendous will be the crash as it runs off the line.

"Let it not be once named among you as becometh saints." It does not mean that the sins are not to be named at all, even for warning and condemnation, for Paul does it here, and frequently elsewhere, for the sake of warning Christians against them. They were the common sins of the heathen,—so familiar to them before becoming Christians, that they might have cherished but a slight sense of the enormity of them, unless they have been named, exposed in their true colors, and rebuked, and Christians enjoined in the most peremptory language to avoid them. But the point the apostle seems chiefly to aim at was enjoining the entire absence of them in Christian society,—so much so, that that there never be a necessity for mentioning the name of such vices. Let it not have an existence, appears to be, in general terms, the purport of the apostle's exhortation, and thereby the very name will drop out of your vocabulary.

However, I am not sure he did not also include it in the actual naming of such sins in ordinary conversation, at least the talking of them from choice and without cause, for he goes on to give directions against indecent conversation and all levity of speech and manner (also see ver. 12). With reference to the avoidance of the very names of the sins connected with this vice, Scripture warns against dwelling upon the sin, and gives sharp, short, rifle-shot exhortations, such as—"Flee fornication."

There are creatures that are fitted to stand their ground when attacked, for nature has furnished them with powers of resistance, but others are utterly helpless and have their safety only in flight. A lion may stand against a whole pack of hounds, and tear them all in pieces, but the little helpless hare is no match for even a single dog, and her only chance of life is to flee. So is it with us Christians in regard to sin. Considering our utter weakness, we dare not dally with temptation to such a sin as fornication, and stand to look at it, intending not to commit it: our only safety is in flight.—British Evangelist.

CHRIST is our Master—master of our thoughts and meditations, the great leader and teacher of our understandings. We are his disciples, and disciples of none else besides. We are affected by the love of family, the love of friendship, the love of country; but there is a love that is higher than all these—a master-love, and this is love to Jesus our Well-Beloved, the Bridegroom of our souls.—Spurgeon.

Man's Present State; and its bearing on his future destiny.

E. ROYCE.

(Concluded from last No.)

But to return to my subject. Any thing is "cursed," in a scriptural sense, when it has a superior either in intellectual or productive power. It is written of the serpent, that he was "more subtile than any other beast of the field." That is having a better intellect, he excelled all beasts in his ability to reason. And in this respect he was more than a match for the woman, also, as the record shows. But as knowledge put to an unlawful use often proves a bane to its possessor, so it proved with the serpent. For while it was as necessary, in order to accomplish the plan of the Creator, laid "before the world began," for the eternal welfare of the race, that the first Adam should eat of the interdicted tree, as it was for the last to suffer and die; yet in the former, as well as latter case, the instrument which caused the unlawful act must receive the kind of wages due for his work. And this the serpent did receive. For the result of his persuasive power on the women, and through her on the man, caused both to * rise as far above him in knowledge as they were before superior in form and features. And this was the serpents curse. That is to be obliged to remain in his natural state without opportunity to improve beyond the bounds of his nature. And as nature made him physically lower than any beast, God said to him "Because thou hast done this thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field," &c. I wish to be understood on this subject. So I will repeat that the natural state of man, of beasts and of the earth, is scripturally called a curse or evil one, in comparison with something of either kind which has by a special blessing been elevated above its natural condition. Man was like all beasts, made of dust; consequently his animal nature is the same. He was not in that respect superior to the serpent, and was his inferior in developed intellect, as has been shown, until he partook of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. But by that act his hitherto dormant moral faculties were awakened, which elevated him in intellectual capacity far above any animal, of any kind whatever. And this, I again repeat, was the serpents curse; and it was all the curse that ever rested on any animal, as a consequence of that act. The same rule holds good with the earth. It was left in its natural, i. e. "cursed" state, in comparison with the garden which received from its Maker a special blessing. And this was done for man's benefit. Hence, God said to him, "cursed be the ground for thy sake," &c. And the reason for this is obvious. He was designed by his Maker for a higher, nobler, and more useful life than dwelling in indolent ease in a spontainiously fruitful garden. Cannot the reader perceive that if Adam or Eve had been permitted to endlessly dwell there the object for which they were created would have been frustrated? For what purpose was man created? Was it Gods design that he should live on forever in mortality, in indolence and ease, with no more care for the morrow, or hope for the future than the beasts of the field, or fowls of the air? Can gold be tried without fire! How then can the heart be purified from the dross incident to mortality, and be thus fitted to receive this good end, without enduring firey trials and temptations, and learning the great lesson of self-denial which is the first stepping-stone to a higher and nobler life? Is it true that the first Adam was so much better by nature than the last? that while the latter had to endure tribulation, sorrow and death to become an heir to his Father's kingdom, the former could have obtained it without an effort? I think not. Neither was he, as it is claimed, a "candidate" for immortality while in the garden. For the very good reason that no one can be eligible to that condition exactly by faith. And as he had not at that time felt the need of salvation, he could have had no faith in a Saviour. And to make him feel that need, and thus become a candidate for life eternal, he was excluded from the garden.

But perhaps there is no one point where the value of a right understanding of this law is so manifest as in the light it throws on the ultimate destroy of the great mass of the human race. For notwithstanding the oft repeated declarations found in scripture, that there will be grades of reward and punishment according to character, and opportunities for knowledge, yet the interpertation by the great body of christendom has been that the two extremes, life and death, or saved and lost, define, in the full sense the fate of all. That is, the saved will alike be rewarded in the extreme and all others will be lost, or damned in the corresponding extreme. Hence, some teachers picture a beautiful heaven of rest "beyond the bounds of time and space," for the beautiful few, while others adopt the more scriptural view of home in a redeemed earth. But both agree that the wrath of an offended God will, in some form, either by conscious tor- or absolute destruction, abide forever on the "unjust," which in numerical numbers make up the great mass of humanity. And yet I have found few, if any, among the claimants for the great prize of eternal life, who have so perfectly obeyed the commands of, and patterned after the Master, as to be willing or able to say, with all truth and sincerity, they are scripturally fitted, and consequently amenable to it. The truth is, and it is useless to disguise it, if men must be superlatively good in order to be saved at all, then the whole race, without exception, will surely be damned, whatever that term may mean. We learn, however, by this law that the future damnation, about which so much has been said and written, instead of being the vindictive vengeance of an offended God, meted out in full measure on the sinner (what a libel on the character of our heavenly Father) consists in the loss which each person must suffer, in a greater or less degree, in proportion as they neglect the opportunity to become Christ-like; or, in other words, invest their "talent" to the best advantage. So it will prove true, that "whatsoever a man soweth, that also shall he reap." And thus will all "receive the things in body according to that he hath done, whether good or bad." Or, in other words, be beaten with many or few "stripes," according to his deserts. And depend upon it "every transgression" will receive "a just recompense of reward." The idea that a man who spends his life in utter disregard of the laws of God and man, and then when near death, throws the fag end of his existence into the hands of his Maker, and by the mere act of thinking well of his Son, or praying to him even, can so completely shift the load of guilt from his own shoulders to those of another, that his disembodied soul can fly away guiltless to heaven, is as absurd as it is unscriptural and unjust. No! Such men surely will, as they ought to do, "reap corruption." As well might we believe that the husbandman could raise good grain by sowing thistle-seed as that such characters can inherit the kingdom of God. There will be few inheritors of that kingdom, the "elect" only; all others will fall short of it. "Many run," says the apostle, "but few win the race." And these winners though "chosen" for this purpose "before the world began," were not selected because they were by nature better than other competitors, but because they improved the space given, instead of loitering by the way. Neither were they chosen for, nor will their reward consist in singing psalms and hymns forever; nor, as many fondly hope, in dwelling at their ease forever in a fruitful and luxurious garden, the counterpart of the one once located in Eden. Nor will the saints' rest be reached until the work to which they are called is completed. That rest "remaineth" somewhere in the "ages to come," but it surely will not be found in the age to come.

What was the mission of Christ on earth? Was it not to minister to those who were groping in darkness and needed help? And must not his Bride—his true followers possess his self-sacrificing spirit, and by closely following his example, so crucify the world, the flesh and the devil, that they will be fit instruments to do the same? And what good would all this do, except to themselves, if there was to be no opportunity to bring these tribulation born gifts into exercise?

But I must draw this article to a close, and will do so by remarking that at the end of this age every individual will receive what is due him: that is, justice. He will receive no more: that is mercy. If any man has so corrupted himself that he is a blotch on the escutcheon of humanity, and doubtless there have been, and are such, he will remain in the congregation of the dead. But all whose spirits are quickened and are as a consequence raised from the dead, will be caused to re live for a good purpose—their own benefit. This is in harmony with the revealed character of both the Father and the Son, and, as previously shown, there is nothing in Scripture to militate against it when correctly understood. I believe I have fulfilled my promise made at the commencement, to lay a foundation in Scripture, and reason logically on it. Whether I have really done either the candid reader must judge for himself If I have, believe it. If I have not, reject it. I invite friendly, candid criticism, but despise ridicule—a commodity sometimes used for the want of argument. One thing is certain, that while the Scriptures teach few in a special sense will be saved, they also affirm that in a general one the redeemed will constitute a "great multitude which no man can number." How this large class are to have their lives perpetuated in their resurrected, mortal state I know not. I would suggest, however, that as God made nothing in vain, and as the tree of life, which was evidently designed to perpetuate mortal life only, was not, so far as we know brought into use in the garden, and is mentioned as occupying a place in a future age (Rev. 22 : 2), it is not unreasonable to suppose that "the nations of the saved" there mentioned are identical with the "great multitude," and that their lives may be prolonged for an indefinite period by eating of that tree. Whether they will continue to live on in that way forever, or whether at the end of the ages when God is "all in all," they will, by having improved their opportunities, finally obtain eternal life, revelation does not inform us. It is enough for us to know on this point that they do not get it in the next age, and if we desire so to do, we must improve the present time, and, like the apostle, continually "press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

The Bible.

H. WILLETT.

We sometimes hear the declaration, that the Bible is like a fiddle, upon which any tune can be played. Yes, says one, I have heard different kinds of tunes played upon it, according to the desire of the operator; and I have about come to the conclusion that the book you call the word of God, is nothing more after all than the word of man, and can be made to mean anything the interpreter has skill to delineate.

I dare say that the inspired word appears thus to many: and that it has thus been handed by man, from which cause sad results have followed. But do not these results arise (to use the figure mentioned) from handling the instrument improperly, or in not understanding the true principles of God's praise book?

To illustrate somewhat further: to play well and correctly upon an instrument of music, a proper knowledge of the gamut or scale is quite necessary in the start, as a foundation for future work that will be reliable.

Paul says, (1 Cor. 14 : 7.) "And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped." Therefore to play correctly and divinely true, and clear, upon the Bible as an instrument of music, it is of the utmost importance to understand the A B C of God's instruction-book to man.

Then again, to play well, one must have a discriminating ear, to tune the instrument, or in other words, to "hear what the spirit saith to the churches," so as to distinguish tones—sharps and flats, so to speak. It will not do to keep on sharping too much by the agency of man, or we spoil the divine music. Neither to flat too much and thus marr the piece. As perhaps some have heard players on the word flatten right out for want of knowledge. Hence it is of great imporance that the signature of the piece be kept constantly in mind, for instance the signature Jesus, and play as he directs, and not throw in accidentals at man's suggestion or notion. Then all the strings or doctrines, should be kept in just relation to each other to preserve harmony: none too loosely or too tightly drawn: and in playing one must not touch the keys or strings too hurriedly, or loosely, neither confusedly, lest there be wanting a distinction of sounds, as Paul says, and the hearer may not know what is piped or harped. Again some can play only on one string, and in fact grate upon it by human power to that degree that the noise finally becomes outrageous, and drives people away from the performer and instrument both: and at last the music and instrument are called humbugs. Whereas the performer is the one upon whom the blame ought only to rest.

Again there is a class of performers that seem to have no ear for heavenly music, but play somewhat like an organ grinder for so much a tune. Will play it you pay: but always the same old tunes over and over until it is concluded the instrument can be made to play no other, and people don't care much for it anyhow.

But then again there are some performers—who think a great deal of themselves and their qualifications that profess they can tune and play just right; in fact they know how to play on any instrument, even upon a harp of a thousand strings, to hear them talk. Well they play over the keys and strings and make quite a noise, but there does not seem to be much melody but confusion, rattle and bang, and those who are not deceived by appearances, but who can appreciate correct harmony and melody turn away with disgust. If the deficiencies of the performer are not discerned or understood by the people at large in these cases, I wonder not at the disrespect and indifference manifested by so many toward the inspired strains written for man's careful study and application. I admit the Bible can be prepared to a musical instrument in some respects, and if properly understood, and in the hands of the true believer, it will sound forth the sweetest chords and melodies that ever fell upon the ear of man. "And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders; and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth." (Rev. 14 : 3.)

The Day They Died.

S. K. GIBSON.

It is sometimes thought that the thief on the cross did not die the same day that Christ died; therefore they could not have been together in Paradise that day.

It is true we are not dependent upon the decision of this question for the proof of men's immortality, yet I always feel that it is best to base our arguments upon evidence that is unquestionable, on this point: and certainly we are not driven to extremities yet, and need only use such arguments as can be well supported by scripture.

I understand that the crucifixion took place on Thursday, and that was on the day before the feast of the passover, the Jewish yearly feast, and called "a high day." It come on the day before the weekly sabbath; so then, at this time two sabbath days come together, the one (the high day) on Friday, the other on Saturday.

The Jews had a law, or custom that a criminal should not remain on the cross over the Sabbath day, and all work must be done up; therefore they set apart a portion of the day before to prepare for the Sabbath; this they called "the preparation day." It began at the ninth hour, or 3 o'clock p. m. The crucifixion took place at the third hour of the day, or nine a. m., (see Mark 15 : 25.) "And when the sixth hour was come there was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour," and at the ninth hour "Jesus cried with a loud voice and gave up the ghost."

"The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day, for that Sabbath day was a high day, besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away." They break the legs of the thieves because they were not dead, for Christ was dead and they break not his legs.

The Jews were now preparing for the Sabbath day which began at six o'clock; they only had three hours from the time Christ died in which to complete the work: Their law not only forbade their leaving their dead bodies upon the cross over Sabbath, but they must be taken down and buried that day before the Sabbath begins which was at six o'clock. (See Deut. 21 : 23).

"His body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day." The thieves, with Christ had already hung upon the cross over six hours, and long enough for Christ to die; but as the thieves were not yet quite dead, and the time of preparation had come in which they must be disposed of according to their law; therefore they were dispatched by breaking their legs. This is evident from the testimony of John: "But when they came to Jesus and saw that he was dead already, they break not his legs."

"The Romans often permitted the culprit to remain upon the cross until his body fell to the earth by its own weight; but in the province of Judea the Jews were permitted in obedience to the precept of their law to terminate the sufferings of the malefactor before sundown. This was effected in various ways, sometimes by setting fire to the foot of the cross, and at other times by breaking the limbs with a hammer, or piercing the body with a lance." (Bible Union Dictionary.)

With what testimony I am able to gather, I am let to believe that Christ and the two thieves died on the same day and were also buried, according to Jewish law.

One thing is certain, that while the Scriptures teach few in a special sense will be saved, they also affirm that in a general one the redeemed will constitute a "great multitude which no man can number." How this large class are to have their lives perpetuated in their resurrected, mortal state I know not. I would suggest, however, that as God made nothing in vain, and as the tree of life, which was evidently designed to perpetuate mortal life only, was not, so far as we know brought into use in the garden, and is mentioned as occupying a place in a future age (Rev. 22 : 2), it is not unreasonable to suppose that "the nations of the saved" there mentioned are identical with the "great multitude," and that their lives may be prolonged for an indefinite period by eating of that tree. Whether they will continue to live on in that way forever, or whether at the end of the ages when God is "all in all," they will, by having improved their opportunities, finally obtain eternal life, revelation does not inform us. It is enough for us to know on this point that they do not get it in the next age, and if we desire so to do, we must improve the present time, and, like the apostle, continually "press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

NOTE.—We differ with the writer in some of his views which he here sets forth in a kind spirit, and propose presenting our reasons for our disagreement at a proper time.—ED. TIMES.

The Bible.

H. WILLETT.

We sometimes hear the declaration, that the Bible is like a fiddle, upon which any tune can be played. Yes, says one, I have heard different kinds of tunes played upon it, according to the desire of the operator; and I have about come to the conclusion that the book you call the word of God, is nothing more after all than the word of man, and can be made to mean anything the interpreter has skill to delineate.

I dare say that the inspired word appears thus to many: and that it has thus been handed by man, from which cause sad results have followed. But do not there results arise (to use the figure mentioned) from handling the instrument improperly, or in not understanding the true principles of God's praise book?

To illustrate somewhat further: to play well and correctly upon an instrument of music, a proper knowledge of the gamut or scale is quite necessary in the start, as a foundation for future work that will be reliable.

Paul says, (1 Cor. 14: 7.) "And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped." Therefore to play correctly and divinely true, and clear, upon the Bible as an instrument of music, it is of the utmost importance to understand the A B C of God's instruction-book to man.

Then again, to play well, one must have a discriminating ear, to tune the instrument, or in other words, to "hear what the spirit saith to the churches," so as to distinguish tones—sharps and flats, so to speak. It will not do to keep on sharping too much by the agency of man, or we spoil the divine music. Neither to flat too much and thus marr the piece. As perhaps some have heard players on the word flatten right out for want of knowledge. Hence it is of great imporance that the signature of the piece be kept constantly in mind, for instance the signature Jesus, and play as he directs, and not throw in accidentals at man's suggestion or notion. Then all the strings or doctrines, should be kept in just relation to each other to preserve harmony: none too loosely or too tightly drawn: and in playing one must not touch the keys or strings too hurriedly, or loosely, neither confusedly, lest there be wanting a distinction of sounds, as Paul says, and the hearer may not know what is piped or harped. Again some can play only on one string, and in fact grate upon it by human power to that degree that the noise finally becomes outrageous, and drives people away from the performer and instrument both: and at last the music and instrument are called humbugs. Whereas the performer is the one upon whom the blame ought only to rest.

Again there is a class of performers that seem to have no ear for heavenly music, but play somewhat like an organ grinder for so much a tune. Will play it you pay: but always the same old tunes over and over until it is concluded the instrument can be made to play no other, and people don't care much for it anyhow.

But then again there are some performers—who think a great deal of themselves and their qualifications that profess they can tune and play just right; in fact they know how to play on any instrument, even upon a harp of a thousand strings, to hear them talk. Well they play over the keys and strings and make quite a noise, but there does not seem to be much melody but confusion, rattle and bang, and those who are not deceived by appearances, but who can appreciate correct harmony and melody turn away with disgust. If the deficiencies of the performer are not discerned or understood by the people at large in these cases, I wonder not at the disrespect and indifference manifested by so many toward the inspired strains written for man's careful study and application. I admit the Bible can be prepared to a musical instrument in some respects, and if properly understood, and in the hands of the true believer, it will sound forth the sweetest chords and melodies that ever fell upon the ear of man. "And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders; and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth." (Rev. 14:3.)

The Day They Died.

S. K. GIBSON.

It is sometimes thought that the thief on the cross did not die the same day that Christ died; therefore they could not have been together in Paradise that day.

It is true we are not dependent upon the decision of this question for the proof of men's immortality, yet I always feel that it is best to base our arguments upon evidence that is unquestionable, on this point: and certainly we are not driven to extremities yet, and need only use such arguments as can be well supported by scripture.

I understand that the crucifixion took place on Thursday, and that was on the day before the feast of the passover, the Jewish yearly feast, and called "a high day." It come on the day before the weekly sabbath; so then, at this time two sabbath days come together, the one (the high day) on Friday, the other on Saturday.

The Jews had a law, or custom that a criminal should not remain on the cross over the Sabbath day, and all work must be done up; therefore they set apart a portion of the day before to prepare for the Sabbath; this they called "the preparation day." It began at the ninth hour, or 3 o'clock p. m. The crucifixion took place at the third hour of the day, or nine a. m., (see Mark 15: 25.) "And when the sixth hour was come there was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour," and at the ninth hour "Jesus cried with a loud voice and gave up the ghost."

"The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day, for that Sabbath day was a high day, besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away." They break the legs of the thieves because they were not dead, for Christ was dead and they break not his legs.

The Jews were now preparing for the Sabbath day which began at six o'clock; they only had three hours from the time Christ died in which to complete the work: Their law not only forbade their leaving their dead bodies upon the cross over Sabbath, but they must be taken down and buried that day before the Sabbath begins which was at six o'clock. (See Deut. 21: 23).

"His body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day." The thieves, with Christ had already hung upon the cross over six hours, and long enough for Christ to die; but as the thieves were not yet quite dead, and the time of preparation had come in which they must be disposed of according to their law; therefore they were dispatched by breaking their legs. This is evident from the testimony of John: "But when they came to Jesus and saw that he was dead already, they break not his legs."

"The Romans often permitted the culprit to remain upon the cross until his body fell to the earth by its own weight; but in the province of Judea the Jews were permitted in obedience to the precept of their law to terminate the sufferings of the malefactor before sundown. This was effected in various ways, sometimes by setting fire to the foot of the cross, and at other times by breaking the limbs with a hammer, or piercing the body with a lance." (Bible Union Dictionary.)

With what testimony I am able to gather, I am let to believe that Christ and the two thieves died on the same day and were also buried, according to Jewish law.

EW NOTES OF SERMON BY WM. MAC ULLOCH, AT WYANET CAMP MEETING, UESDAY P. M., SEPT. 2, 1873.

xt, 1 Cor 1:30.—"But of him are ye in Christ who of God is made unto us wisdom, and right-ness, and sanctification, and redemption."

ne text is addressed to brethren. re are two kinds of wisdom; "not ny wise after the flesh...are called." 26.) There is a worldly wisdom; e who have it are foreseeing, can e good bargains, and get on in the ld; but this is not the kind of wis spoken of in the text. James (3: says, "This wisdom descendeth from above, but is earthly, sensual, lish. But the wisdom that is from ve is first pure, then peaceable, tle, and easy to be entreated, full mercy and good fruits, without iality, and without hypocrisy." 17.) This wisdom is first pure, then eable; and when Paul went to ch he determined to know nothing ng them but Christ. If this ex- le were followed always, the suc of preachers would be greater, the results more satisfactory.

WISDOM, then

RIGHTEOUSNESS. After we have ceived wisdom from above we are fitted to develop a righteous rse of life. "Let not the wise man ry in his wisdom, neither let the hty man glory in his might; let not rich man glory in his riches, [all from God, God has given them, will hold you responsible for n,]—but let him that glorieth glory this, that he understandeth and weth me, that I am the Lord." The d is our righteousness, as well as wisdom.

The Lord Jesus is also our SANC ICATION. John 17:8, shows us the ns by which Christ becomes our ctification. "I have given unto m the words which thou gavest me; they have received them, and have wn surely that I came out from e." They have received the words truth, they are set apart as my fol- ers; they have received, believed, obeyed. "The world hath hated m." Why? Because they were ntified with Christ and his truth. says "I will pray for them." And does pray, "Sanctify them through truth, thy word is truth."

After sanctification comes RE PTION. It is true there is a present emption; you are "redeemed from r vain conversation," but this is all,—there is eternal redemption,"— ive with, and be like Jesus, and die more. We are first made morally, n physically like him. Try and mplify his moral characteristics, t we may share in the glories of the ure redemption. Job speaks of this emption by Jesus, "I know that my DEEMER liveth, and that he shall d at the latter day upon the earth, ,"—I guess he was an Adventist! was going to have eyes to see him h.

Has Christ become to you your wis- n? Your righteousness? Your sanc- ation? Have you received the words d gave him, and he has given you? en live for God, for glory, honor, nortality; and you shall have full emption when Christ who is our shall appear. Be in earnest, and will have an influence on those und, and have some for a crown of icing in that day. Amen.

Perfection in Christ.

A. K. LEWIS.

The diversity of opinions entertained professing Christians is consequent the various terms of Scripture, not ng understood or applied where y belong. People see things ac- ding to the kind of spectacles they ar. In theology it is much the same. n pick up the opinion of some doc- or divine, on a given subject, and ke it for law and gospel. Let the ble be the umpire in determining the truth. We read of God's address to Satan: "Hast thou considered thy servant Job, a perfect and an upright man?" David says: "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright." Why use these terms if they do not mean what they say? Matthew records the command: "Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." Says Paul to the Corinthians: "Howbeit, we speak wisdom among them that are perfect." In his farewell address to the same people, he exhorted them to be perfect. So in his epistle to the Ephesians: "Till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man." And in his second epistle to the Corinthians: "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord." But what is implied in such a state of grace?

1. Not absolute perfection: that belongs only to God. He is essentially, infinitely perfect. Man in this life is not immortal. Therefore, he cannot be perfect in the same sense as the Almighty.

2. It is not angelic perfection.

3. Neither is it Adamic perfection, for Adam was intellectually and physically a perfect man.

Christian perfection is consistent with human frailty; allowing sufficient latitude for perfecting knowledge, fallibility of judgment, and all the infirmities of a fallen nature.

Perfection in Christ consists in the fulfilment of the law of love: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind and strength." "God is love." "He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." "Herein is our love made perfect." So we learn that Christian perfection, in righteousness, imputed to us through the Lord Jesus Christ. So that one may be the temple of the Holy Spirit and be clothed with the salvation of Christ, as he is styled by Jeremiah, "The Lord of our righteousness."

The Silent Sermon.

J. S. THORP.

It has been truly said that a holy life is a continual sermon.

Though it be silent in its speech, yet it speaks with a force that cannot be unheeded, even by the most careless—a force that pulpit oratory never can attain, however eloquent it may be.

We may extol the name of Jesus from the pulpit in words of eloquence and elegance, and be listened to with indifference; but let the humblest disciple of Christ manifest holiness in his daily walk and conversation; let him be meek and lowly as our Saviour was; patient under difficulties; bold and fearless in danger; trusting and confident even in the darkest hour; and he will wield an influence for Christ which all the wisdom and eloquence of this world cannot equal.

Best of all sermons is the silent sermon of a holy life: and indeed without it, all other preaching is useless and vain.

Trust.

G. E. MERRILL

"Trust in him at all times."—(Ps. 62: 8.)

"In times of trouble, and in seasons of affliction, we often are left to feel so much of the hardness of our own hearts, to see such deep and unexpected corruption in our nature, and to be severely buffeted by Satan, that we are ready to conclude that it would be presumption to hold fast our confidence. We are violently tempted to distrust God, to doubt his love, and rashly conclude that we have deceived ourselves, and everybody about us. To trust in God then is exceedingly difficult; for we can not help thinking that he is dealing with us in wrath, not in mercy; and to conclude, if he had love for us, he would not deal so hardly with us. All this is from the flesh, or from Satan. We are not to judge of God's nature from the dispensations of his providence, but from the testimony of his word. His work is not yet finished, but his word is perfe[illegible] The end he has immediately in [illegible] our present trial, we know not [illegible] his word he assures us the[illegible] ill [illegible]d well. God is to be trusted [illegible] he can not be traced. He is to be trusted by us in the dark, as well as in the light,—when he smites us, as much as when he comforts and cheers us. We should give him credit for wisdom, mercy, and truth; and trust him to manifest his wisdom, display his mercy, and make plain his truth. Trusting in God, honors him, confounds Satan, and brings us peace and comfort; therefore trust in him at all times. Gracious Lord, enable us to trust in thee, to believe the love thou hast to us, and so glorify thy free and sovereign grace! Oh! crush our unbelief, scatter our fears, and give us strong and steady confidence in thy blessed self."

Waiting to be Ready.

When Christ was on earth, a great many persons that came to him were going to be his disciples after preparation. One says, "I will follow thee, but suffer me first"—"Stop!" says the Saviour; "I do not want you unless you follow me at once." These suffer-me-first folk are not the ones to follow Christ. If you have any secular preparation to make, you are not the one to follow Christ. When he was on earth, and people came to him, what he demanded of them was this: "Follow me now."

And that is what he demands of every person to-day. "If any say: "Lord, we do not understand the doctrine yet," he says, "Then follow me for that reason, and I will teach you." "Lord, we do not feel that our hearts are sufficiently subdued." "Follow me, and then they will become subdued." "But, Lord, we do not know that we shall hold out." "You certainly will not if you do not begin. The best way is to follow me just as you are."

Reader, you must either follow Christ or go away from him. You must either accept or renounce him. And if any one is conscious of being sinful, has a burdened conscience, has a heavy heart, and needs consolation and salvation, I beseech you to follow Christ unhesitatingly, and he will reveal, hour by hour, and day by day, what your duty is, and all that is needful for you to know.—Methodist Recorder.

A Beautiful Incident.

A naval officer being at sea in a dreadful storm, his wife, who was sitting in the cabin near him, and filled with alarm for the safety of the vessel, was so surprised with his composure and serenity that she cried out,

"My dear, are you not afraid? How is it possible you can be so calm in such a dreadful storm?"

He rose from his chair lashed to the deck, supporting himself by a pillar of the bed-place, drew his sword, and pointing it to the breast of his wife, he exclaimed:

"Are you afraid of that sword?"

She instantly answered, "No."

"Why?" said the officer.

"Because," rejoined the lady, "I know it is in the hands of my husband, and he loves me too well to hurt me."

"Then," said he, "remember I know in whom I believe, and that he holds the winds in his fists and the waters in the hollow of his hands."

HE who rejoices in God will never be confounded or ashamed, world without end. It is an abiding joy. If I rejoice in the sun, it sets; if in the earth, it shall be burnt; if in myself, I shall die; but to triumph in One who never fails and never changes, but lasts forever—this is a lasting joy.—Spurgeon.

The Christian Life.

Worship the Lord.

S. B. MABRY.

For thou shalt worship no other God (Ex. 34:14.)

Men ever desire to worship some object. Israel were in fault—Moses was away up in mount Sinai, attending to the Lord's work, and the people did not know when he would return: "And when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, Up, make us gods which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we know not what has become of him." (Ex. 32:1) They desire Aaron to make them a god for a leader, and he was just simple enough to gratify their desires.

Wherever there is a demand for any of the Devil's inventions, there is generally a supply. This fact is demonstrated the world over. And here the children in the wilderness were made to worship the workmanship of their hands—a Golden Calf. The result was, Moses returned and overthrew their idols; and had it not been for the pleading of Moses in their behalf, they would then and there been destroyed. After all God's blessings and their remarkable deliverance from bondage in Egypt and the Red Sea, the food sent to keep them from starving, and the water to keep them from dying of thirst; they turned traitors to the rule of Moses; and yet had it not been for him, they would have perished.

There are many lessons which could be drawn from this narrative by type and antetype. We desire to notice a few.

As they were journeying toward the land of Canaan, and after wandering in the wilderness forty years and lost many of their number, whom Paul says perished for their unbelief. So, under the Gospel plan of redemption, through Christ, God has been calling mankind to leave the world of sin, and journey by faith to the land of immortality and bliss. Yet men wander in the wilderness of sin a life-time, and fail to be saved by hope in Christ the Lord.

Israel, might have gained the land of Canaan in a short time, and been an unbroken band doubtless, had they chosen to obey the command of their leader. So men in the present age, this last dispensation and day of probation, might have life and been saved forever if they would heed the command of the text and listen to their leader's voice, who now is in the holy place with the Father, and obey his commands. As Moses was leader, and plead the case of Israel (Ex. 35:11.) before God—praying him to stay his hand and be not wroth against them, so Jesus, the only begotten Son of God, has been given to a guilty world for a leader; and only from the fact of his being "mediator," our "great high priest," and by the power of his pleading before God, that condemnation is removed and vengeance is stayed, sinners are privileged with the opportunity to be made free from bondage and escape the wrath to come. Lay hold on eternal life, gain the heavenly shores of immortality.

The spirit manifested by ancient Israel, has seemingly come down and is manifested in our day. People worship (as Christ said) they know not what. It may not be in bowing down to calves of gold, to images of wood and stone, yet many desire and love and worship some object. Some may worship and hold dear in their affections pre-eminent above all else the blessings of God, such as fine cattle, fast hors[illegible] farms, city property, gold, sil[illegible]reenbacks, mortgages, bonds, w[illegible]nd [illegible]ren, being so much ab[illegible] in [illegible]rit of the wo[illegible] as to worship some of the various objects, and benefits more than the Benefactor the Lord of Hosts; while our text declares that man should worship no other God.

Many times people have idols in their hearts, but do not find it out until the Lord, by some overruling providence, permits the object to be snatched suddenly away.

Oh, how often do men, good men seemingly, to all outward appearance, fail in a worldly point of view, by failures in business, loss of property, some unexpected calamity befalls them, and they meet with disappointment and adversity, all of which may be to learn them a lesson or to show them the object they worship.

Churchmen may worship fine churches, fancy preachers, fine organs, waste means in decorating edifices in which are sounded out the fables and infidelity of men, rather than the truth of God.

Let poor wayfaring men of God come to procure some of these towering piles of wood and stone in which to tell the glorious proclamation of great tidings to sinners, and salvation for cold hearted professors of religion, and they are often refused, at once; while, on the other hand, a traveling apothecary with squibs of adventures and wonderful scenes can have access without trouble, have free course, run and be glorified by men.

The trouble to day among many (thank the Lord not all) people is, that their hearts are seemingly set on their special church and creed and mode of service, more than upon God: hence we call it Idolatry. It makes but little difference what the professions are,—here is the fruit and the evil.

How many, like Peter, having had the shackles of sin knocked off, yet have returned to the beggarly elements of the world.

Men encompass sea and land to make money, to expend it lavishly, to make a fair show in the flesh before the world, while the cause of Christ seemingly to outward appearance, for all they know at least, is going a begging; and were it not for an Elijah's God who sends the ravens, verily some pressure might be felt more severely on the cause of Christ then at present, especially financially. People are not to blame for properly attending the affairs of life; for he command is "to occupy," "to be diligent in business," yet when men care more for the things of the world then they do for the things of God, and are overburdened with cares and duties unnecessarily, this is seemingly Idolatry.

Scriptures teach throughout that it is necessary to love the Lord with all the heart, mind, might and strength; and every man in the wide universe is under obligation to God to do this! "Love not the world, neither the things of the world is the apostle's teaching; and again—"If any man love the world, the love of the father is not in him." He demands our all to be consecrated to his service—time, talents, money; and unless men are willing to take up the cross, leave all for Christ, they can not be his disciples: and yet no man has ever done this but what he has been doubly repaid. No man, says Jesus, "hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children for the Kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting. (Luke 18:29:30)

Let the people learn wisdom, and destroy every idol in the land, and worship God only. Love him and serve him with an undivided affection. Rid the heart of every idol, for none but the pure in heart shall see God;" and "without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

IF thou bear the cross cheerfully, it will bear thee, and lead thee to the desired end; namely, where there shall be an end of suffering, though here there shall not be.

Give your Name, Postoffice, County and State every time you write.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, October 14, 1873.

THE address of Elder C. W. Turner, who recently left the M. E. Church, is Hartford, Wis.

WE expect to attend the dedication, near Avalanch, Wis., on the 26th of this month, and hope to meet a goodly number of our old friends there.

PLEASE do not write for the paper with pencil. We have not time to re-write such articles. Use pen and ink, and write plainly.

IN this paper, article Man's Present State, 33rd line, for "nairal," read "natural." Through mistake, also, a foot note was omitted till that side of the paper was in press.

AGAIN we ask friends to desist from writing their appointments or obituaries on the same sheet that you write a letter or article. It subjects us to the trouble of re-writing, or delays the insertion.

WE learn that Elder Wm. Sweet, of Minnesota, is going to New England to spend the winter, but intends to return in the spring. We trust that he will help extend the circulation of the TIMES on his tour by obtaining new subscribers.

HAVING recently received several pressing calls to attend meetings at times when other engagements prevented, we again suggest that you notify us of your wishes in time for us to lay our plans, so that we shall not be obliged to say No so often to your requests.

IT was our pleasure to attend the Quarterly Conference held at Union Mills, Indiana, Oct. 2–5, where we met Brethren Ferriss, Mathewson, Winchel, and Nafe, all of whom are preaching the Gospel of the kingdom within the bounds of this new conference. We visited this town nineteen years ago, and preached the word; but time has wrought great changes since then. Elder Ferriss is now officiating as their pastor, and is held in esteem by the church, as also his predecessor, Elder D. Mathewson. Our meeting was a season of interest, both to the church in the place, and to visiting brethren.

WE have received a sample copy of Constable's new work, "The Duration and Nature of Future Punishment," a well bound and neatly printed volume of 330 pages, published by Kelleway & Brown, London. We have ordered a quantity for sale; price $1.

Constable is a strong, deep, candid and scholarly writer. His productions so teem with thought and abound with logic, that they chain the attention even of those who do not believe his theory. We doubt not this work is destined to accomplish great good, especially among the clergy, in revolutionizing theology on the question of future punishment.

Souls becoming Angels.

In a recent number of the Journal and Messenger, an article appears from the pen of Prof. D. Weston, D.D., treating on this question; and although the professor himself holds the theory that gives birth to this feature of revised heathen mythology, he deals out some impressive arguments against it, which we here quote, interspersing them with a few comments.

> In the recent numbers of the Christian Union there have appeared four articles from the pen of the Rev. John C. Abbott, entitled "Christians in Heaven." It is the object of the articles to prove that Christians after death retain the closest intimacy with th things of earth, hover about the scenes of their earthly lives and are the heavenly guardians of their surviving friends. The argument is briefly as follows: 1. "When Christians die they become angels." 2. Angels are "familiar with the affairs of this world." 3. "Angels who have lived in this world, that is, redeemed men and women, must take a deeper interest in affairs which are transpiring on earth than those angels who have never resided here." Of course the validity of the argument all turns upon the truth of the first position, that when Christians die they become angels.
> Mr. Abbott is not alone in holding this position. Early in the third century it was taught by Origen that men and angels were identical at their creation, and will be so again at the restitution of all things. Wesley, in the last century, and Bushnell in the present, have expressed a similar view; an article in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible implies it; it is often heard from the pulpit; it is the teaching of many a Sunday-school book and Sunday school hymn.
> In proof of this position, Mr. Abbott cites Luke 20: 35, 36; 1 Cor. 6: 3; Rev. 22: 8, 9, and concludes from them: "Surely this must prove to all who accept the Bible that Christians when they die become angels." The first of these passages: "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection," treats not of Christians as they are now in heaven, but as they shall be after the resurrection, and implies rather that they will not, than that they will be angels; for if they are to be actually angels, why is it not said so directly instead of that, they shall be equal unto the angels? How Mr. Abbott understands the second passage, "We shall judge angels," to include the statement that we shall be angels, is difficult to say. Of the third passage, the angel's words to John, "I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren the prophets," Mr. Abbott says, "That is to say, he was a Christian, and one of the redeemed sons of Adam's lost race." In like manner Wesley says, "When the apostle fell down to worship the glorious spirit which he seems to have mistaken for Christ, he (the spirit) told him plainly, 'I am of thy fellow servants the prophets;' not God, not angel, but a human spirit.' [Sermon 122, on Hebrews 11 : 1.] Bushnell also writes, "And who was that angel in John's vision who said, 'I am of thy brethren the prophets?' Was it Daniel who fasted in such broken plaints of sorrow for his people and country? or was it Jeremiah who cried, 'Oh that my head were waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears?'" [Vicarious Sacrifice, pp. 97, 98.] Is it not strange that neither of these authors looked at the original of the passage of which they made such use? They would have found it to mean simply, "I am a fellow servant of thee and (a fellow servant) of thy brethren the prophets."

While it is true that Origen held the heathen theory of a disembodied existence of the soul, and claimed that it was to be changed into an angel, it is also true that he held to the theory of the pre-existence of souls; in short, that souls were created angels, and that they are imprisoned for a time in mortal tenements, being then called souls; and that finally they are let out of prison by death, and ultimately become angels again.

The theory of the pre-existence of souls is traceable to heathen mythology, and the theory of a disembodied state has no other origin. Origen obtained his speculations, not from the Bible, but from mythology.

Professor Weston again says:

> Again, that angels should appear in human form when they hold intercourse with men, and that their heavenly character should be indicated by shining raiment, is not strange; but that such is not their natural appearance is evident from the fact that, though they are "all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation," guarding Christ's little ones, rejoicing at the sinner's repentance, present in Christian worship, conveying the righteous soul to paradise, yet they have only in a few exceptional and miraculous instances been seen at all.

Christ tells us when the angels will gather the saints—not at the dissolution of the body, but at his future return from heaven: "He shall send forth his angels with [illegible] great [illegible]d of a trumpe[illegible], and they [illegible] gat[illegible]ge- th[illegible]is elect," etc.

The professor continues his argument in the following convincing style:

> Instead of Scripture showing that the human and angelic natures are identical, they furnish, we think, plain indications that these natures are distinct and will remain so forever; indeed, this position seems so obvious as to need no proof, were it not that such men as we have noticed have held the contrary.
> 1. If saints at death become angels, how strange that the Bible never tells us so; that it is never said of Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Elijah, David or any other dead saint that he is now an angel; that Paul, who tells us of his longing "to be clothed upon with his house which is from heaven," "to depart and be with Christ," to be "absent from the body," and "present with the Lord," to receive the crown laid up for him, never once saying in such connection, "I want to be an angel." Says Bushnell: "Some of the angels, we are expressly taught, are men, or the spirits of men, once living on earth. * * * * * Thus we are expressly informed that the angels of the transfiguration are Moses and Elias." [Vicarious Sacrifice, p. 97.] If Moses and Elias were angels, how natural that we should be thus informed; but the Scripture says, "There talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elias."
> 2. What we know of the creation of angels and men points to an essential difference in their natures. Angels were created, had their probation, part of them fell and the destiny of all was fixed forever, before men existed. Men have sprung from an original pair by propagation; angels, so far as we know, are without distinction of sex, and were created individually by a direct act of God. Men were created for an existence on earth, and were composed of spirits in material, earthly bodies; such is their normal, and will be their eternal state, for the body after the resurrection will be the material body of the former life, made glorious and adapted to the wants of the spirit. Angels seem to be adapted to an ethereal abode, and if they have bodies at all, we must suppose them fitted to such abode.
> 3. The Bible often distinguishes between angels and departed saints. For example, Heb. 12:22, 23: "Ye are come unto Mount Zion, * * * and to an innumerable company of angels, * * and to the spirits of just men made perfect." In Rev. 4 and 5, the Lamb is represented in the midst of the elders and the living beings ["beasts," E. V.] who evidently represent the redeemed church, and who sing a new song. * * Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood;' but the angels are round about them, and respond, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain.' Says Alford, "The angels surround on all sides in the more distant space, the smaller circle hitherto described. The church is the central and crowning manifestation of God's power and love and wisdom. Round it, and him, who is its Head, the heavenly hosts are ranged in humble admiration; and into its wonders they desire to look." So in Rev. 7, the redeemed church, they who "have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," are pictured as standing before—literally, in the face of, the throne and the Lamb, while the angels stand round about. And, lastly, in Heb. 2, it is declared that man who is "made a little lower than the angels," is, in Christ Jesus, "crowned with glory and honor," and placed over all the other works of God; "for verily Christ taketh not hold of angels," that is, to raise them, in himself, above the other works of God; "but he taketh hold of the seed of Abraham."
> 4. If Christians, when they die, become good angels, then we should conclude from analogy, that the impenitent when they die become evil angels—devils; against which latter thought the Bible would furnish similar arguments to those adduced against the former. If we think of departed Christian friends as angels of heaven, why not of lost friends who are not Christians as demons of the pit? If we think of a lost, pious mother as hovering over us on angel's wings, to shield us from temptation and lead us in the path of good, why not think of a lost impenitent relative as coming back to us in demon form, haunting our footsteps, throwing temptation around us and striving to lead us to endless perdition and woe?

The points made here by the professor are worthy of consideration. If good souls become angels, why do not bad souls become demons, as the ancient heathen taught. But if death really kills man, instead of subtracting an angel or devil from him, the matter is settled without further argument. Take away the assumption that man has a dual nature, and this speculation about turning into angels or devils at death, expires at once. While the Bible represents man as possessing a soul as well as a body, and teaches that it leaves the body at death, it nowhere teaches that it is a personality, either in the body or out of it. When the term is used to signify life, as is often the case, it is said to leave at the hour of death; but life is not an organization, nor is it capable of consciousness or accountability. Its personality is always assumed and never proved, except when used to signify the physical man. The soul of man no more signifies a man within a man, than the soul of a beast signifies a beast within a beast: "In whose hand is the soul of every living thing." (Job 12: 10) This being so—the soul not being a personality distinct from the body—there is no foundation in fact or Scripture to base the theory of soul transformation upon.

The Jews and the Messiah.

We clip from the Standard the following statement just furnished by its correspondent in the Holy Land. After describing the Mosque of Omar, he says:

> Leaving now this enclosure, of which I have tried to give you a faithful, but I fear an over-minute and tedious description, and passing along the western wall of the Hareem, near the bottom of the Tyropean Valley, we came to one of the saddest spots in all the city—a bit of the oldest wall of the Temple foundation, about 120 feet in length, and perhaps forty or fifty feet high, known as the Wailing Place of the Jews. Their heartless and rigorous rulers allow them this approach to a part of the wall, no doubt of their once beautiful house. Here they assemble, especially on the afternoon of Fridays, pilgrims from all parts of the world, to kiss the cold stones and weep over the desolations of Zion. I visited this sad and suggestive place several times. On one occasion there were two or three hundred of these children of Abraham present, men and women. They stood along the whole face of the wall, with the ancient Scriptures in their hands, and chanted in the most dolorous strains the words of the old prophets. In some places they stood gathered in groups; one seemed to be a leader; he would read or recite, moving his body backward and forward to accompany the cadences of his voice, and all the others would join in the refrain in the same expressive manner. Some seemed unmoved and mechanical in their devotions; others, and the most of them seemed deeply affected. I noticed one woman, who stood quite alone, tastily dressed, with a highly refined and deeply religious face, who leaned her forehead against the rough hard stones, while the tears dropped fast from her eyes! As I looked upon this sight, I said: Is not "the set time to favor Zion" at hand: for surely "her sons take pleasure in her stones and favor the dust thereof?" From this place we followed with the multitude to their synagogue, which is near by. The building was full, and full, too, of confusion. Everybody worshiped "on his own hook"—pardon the expression. Some were praying, some chanting, some reading, some singing, some haranguing. I asked one who stood near me, who I found could speak English, how they regarded the outlook of their people. He said that the prophecies were rapidly fulfilling, and the Messiah would shortly appear. I asked him, "What prophecies?"
> "The prophecies of Daniel, to be sure," he answered. Another, who seemed to be a Rabbi, saw us conversing, and inquired through our interpreter what I was asking. I told him, when he replied: "We know nothing at all, but are in much doubt and despondency." "Why do you not accept Jesus Christ as your Messiah?" I asked. "Because," said he, "Messiah is the Prince of Peace, and these Christians are as full of war and vengeance as the Turks themselves;" and from their stand-point Christianity has anything but a winning aspect. It seems to me, if they could be made to see Christ's religion as it is, that many of the more inquiring Jews would embrace it, and accept their long-rejected King.

Truly the prophecies of Daniel indicate our proximity to the Messiah's appearing: but the same prophecies show that he was to make one mission to be "cut off" at the end of a specific measurement of time, as in the case of Jesus, which time expired long ago. That Messiah the Jews rejected, though he came at the right time, and now they look for one to come who has no claim to the office—never having been "cut off" for the people.

They can well say that the Messiah is the "Prince of Peace," and such is Jesus; but what a withering rebuke this is to the advocates of bloodshed, who "are as full of war and vengeance as the Turks themselves." How this practice falsifies Christianity, and reproaches the Prince of Peace.

Money and Religion.

The expenses of the heathen in their idolatrous worship ought to shame nominal christians, when contraste with what they contribute for th spread of the Gospel among the error beclouded multitudes. The zeal o financial men can be measured by th sacrifices which they themselves make and not by the sacrifices which the would like to see others make. Th same Jesus who once "sat over agains the treasury," and watched the finan cial offerings made by both rich an poor, still looks with approbation eve upon the widow's mite. But now, a then, the rich do less than the poor i proportion to their means, instead c giving "as the Lord has prospere them," as they are instructed to do i the Gospel. If our people would sa rifice as liberally for the Wester Tract Fund as the heathen do for the idol worship, we might arouse the grea West. Shall our zeal be less than th possessed by heathen? Read the fo lowing from one of our exchanges, an ask yourselves whether your zeal f Christ and his truth has got as de into your hearts and pockets as the ze of these heathen had into theirs?

> The heathen spend liberally upon th temples and other things connected with th religious observances. The Missionary Hera an organ of the English Baptists, gives account of a recent visit to Brindabun, a sm city, famed throughout India as a sacred sp in Hindoo worship, connected intimately wi the history of Krisna. The town is full Hindoo temples, in all stages of preservatio Some are in utter ruins, but new houses a built for the gods, and several handsome a spacious temples are now building. T largest of the new temples was built the cost of over $2,000,000. Another c $1,150,000, and the sums annually expend in these two temples respectively is $28,5 and $11,000. Besides these, nearly eve house has its own oratory, containing its id so that in reality this town of about 20, inhabitants contains more than a thousa heathen temples, and the people are alm universally religious.

That Singular Prophecy.

We republish, by request, Moth Shipton's prophecy, and give a f facts concerning its origin as learn from Br. D. Clow, of Janesville, W He presents us the prophecy as copi by Mr Archer, an Englishman, ov forty years ago, from a book containi other matter. Br. Clow has conver with three other persons over seven five years old, born in the old count who distinctly remember the proph in the days of their childhood, and a well remember Mother Shipton's B that contained it.

A REMARKABLE PROPHECY.

The following, which is known as Mot Shipton's prophecy, was published in 1 and republished in 1681:

"Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with wo
Around the world thoughts shall fly,
In the twinkling of an eye:
Water shall yet more wonders do,
Now strange yet shall be true;
The world up side down shall be,
And gold be found at root of tree;
Through the hills men shall ride,
And no horse or ass be at his side;
Under water men shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk;
In the air men shall be seen,
In white, in black, in green;
Iron in the water shall float,
As easy as in a wooden boat;
Gold shall be found, and found
In a land that's not now known;
Fire and water shall wonders do,
England shall at last admit a Jew;
The world unto an end shall come,
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

Mr. Archer copied this from an cient book with his own hand forty years ago in London, the purporting to have been publishe 1681, from an edition issued as e as 1488. Our readers now have result of our inquiry as to its origi

Lamentable Facts.

The Christian Standard cont the following pithy note:

> A good deal of noise has been made o shocking lecture lately delivered by odhull, at Vineland, N. J., in favor of free- e doctrines; but according to the following tract from that lecture, it was not destitute points. It is wise to learn from an enemy. e lecturer has thrust back on her oppo- nts with fatal effect in these sentences:

"Why do you not, in place of asking what ll become of the children, ask what is be- ning of them now? Go ask the fifty thous- l houseless, half starved, wholly untaught ildren of New York city, who live from the ll barrels of the rich Christians, what is coming of them, and they will tell you they n't know. But it will be plain to be seen t they are going to the bad, surely. I can not derstand how it is that the critics of social edom should be so terribly concerned about e children that are to be, when they have no ncern whatever for those who are. Solici- de for children, when there are 5,000,000 of ople in the United States, one eighth of the tal population, over ten years of age, who n neither read nor write! Why, it is sim y absurd! There is no such thing. This etended solicitude is something pumped up the imagination of these idealists as a scare- ow to prevent inquirers after freedom from ding the direct road."

Fraternal Feelings.

The following note, which we clip rom the Crisis, will explain itself:

A PARTING NOTE.

In my press of duties, I had almost forgotten hat I ought to say a few parting words to the eaders of the Crisis. Though my name has tood as corresponding editor of the Crisis up o the present time, my election as editor of he A. C. TIMES has so claimed my attention, hat I have not been able to write for the Crisis for some time. But I do not forget the lear old Crisis, nor have I lost my interest in ts prosperity; and I feel confident that this eeling is reciprocal—that the present editors f the Crisis rejoice in the prosperity of the TIMES; and I trust that the east and west will work together harmoniously. Had I chosen my successors, I could not have done better. The Crisis will prosper in the hands of such men as now manage it, and its readers will enjoy a constant feast.

After three years of official connection with the paper, I leave it to labor elsewhere. I leave it, so far as I know, with the best of feelings between myself and its present editors, and friends at large in the east. My thanks are due to those who reposed confidence in me, in electing me to the office which I have tried to fill in a manner to please God. My imperfections, I trust, will all be passed over, and a place still be granted me in your hearts, while I strive, in my weakness, to do good in another channel. A kind farewell to all.

WM. SHELDON.

Yes, dear Br. Sheldon, you and the friends of the TIMES may be fully assured that we "rejoice" in its "prosperity," and that we stand ready to do what we can to promote the most perfect harmony between the east and the west. We trust our aims are one. We miss you much in the Crisis. May the Lord bless you richly, by giving you health, strength, wisdom, and holiness, suitable for your responsible position.—[EDITORS.]

Attention, Indiana.

The last Indiana Conference appointed two State evangelists—one to labor in the northern, and the other in the southern part of the State. Brother E. C. Andrus is to occupy the former, and brother Geo. W. Green the latter district. And now the next question is, How are they to be supported? We have but few churches in the State, and they are not numerically or financially strong. Still they can do something if they will try. Let every one, then, who wishes to see the truths we teach extensively disseminated throughout the State, in every town, and in the hedges and highways, in every neighborhood where there is a public school-house, or even a private house open to the good work, now lend a helping hand, and these brethren may be instrumental in the conversion of hundreds of perishing sinners. Churches will be gathered and set in order under their ministry, who will in turn contribute to the support of our evangelists, and thereby still further advance the cause of truth. They were instructed to solicit contributions to an evangelical fund, wherever they may hold protracted meetings, and keep an account of the same, and report the amount to the next annual conference.

These [illegible] are in every respect worthy [illegible] confidence of the people who [illegible] enjoy the benefit of their ministry; and I invoke for them the aid and sympathy of all who love the appearing and kingdom of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

N. FIELD, M.D.,
President Ind. Advent Christian Conf.

On the Sick List.

Soon after the camp meeting at Utica brother George W. Miller, in company with his wife and children, took a trip up through the country with a view to attend some appointments, and be present at our meetings in Minneapolis. He took cold on the way, and came near being detained on account of it. He arrived at Minneapolis about the 26th of September, and was taken down sick immediately with typhoid fever. His sickness has caused him much pain and suffering. To-day (Oct. 7) he is out of danger, and getting better as fast as can be expected. He is at the home of brother and sister Desent, where he is having the best of care and medical aid. It will be some time, however, before he can take the field again as evangelist.

His desire is that the brethren of the State Conference should correspond with him. I trust the brethren will do so. Also let it be remembered that brother Miller will have doctors' bills to pay, and other expenses that attend as the result of sickness.

Brother Miller is one of the faithful pioneers in the western field, and now is the time for the lovers of Jesus to sen him some money; that will be help in time of need; don't delay—he needs it now if ever.

D. R. MANSFIELD.

Minneapolis, Oct. 7, 1873.

P.S.—His address is Minneapolis, Minn., in care of brother A. G. Desent.

[Remember brother Miller's needs—he is a servant of God.—ED. TIMES.]

"The Well of Souls."

In a description of the Mosque of Omar, and its appendages, given by the Rev. S. Graves, D. D., on his tour to the Holy Land, reference is made to a rock deemed sacred by the Mohammedans, in these words:

This rock is held to be the identical spot on which Abraham offered Isaac, to have been directly beneath the Holy of Holies in the Temple of Solomon, and that upon it stood the Ark of the Covenant and the Cherubim, whose wings over spread the Mercy Seat; while the Mohammedan maintains that from this rock Mohammed ascended to heaven, and to dissipate all doubt, shows you the print of his foot in the surface of the rock, and also the print of the angel Gabriel's hand, which was placed upon the rock to prevent it from following the prophet!

Beneath this rock are several caves, artificial and natural, with which are connected the names of David, Solomon, Elijah, and Mohammed. One of these contains an opening into the immense subterranean vault. This opening is called the Well of Souls, where one may converse with the spirits of the departed.

So the Mohammedans have a well to keep souls in—not a well of water, but a "well of souls"—down under a big rock. There souls can talk, it is said. If they can't, some Mohammedan can talk for them.

Short Editorials.

The editor of the Baptist Weekly speaks about short editorials in a strain that is not far out of the way, as a general rule, allowing occasional exceptions; and the same principle holds good in other articles, for tediousness is a detriment every where. We quote the following item:

A good brother, fearfully addicted to preaching long sermons, lately requested that we give gre[illegible] to our editorials. Their quality [illegible] proved in the very suggest[illegible] wanted more of the same [illegible] In [illegible] however, we shall do as we have been doing, i. e., say in the shortest space possible what we have to say, wasting no words and assuming that our readers will be better served with brief suggestions than with long dissertations. In newspaper articles, as in preaching, it is well to assume that some things are known and need not be written. We go for brevity, and if any of our readers want tedious editorial essays we would advise them to send their subscriptions to some of our contemporaries who excel in this line. As for ourselves we shall still endeavor to be sound, sharp, and short.

Solomon a Backslider.

BRO. SHELDON:—Will you please give your views on the 11th Chap of 1 Kings?

Does the Bible give any account of Solomon repenting of his sins before he died, or not?

J. W. BURRITT.

WE know of no positive proof that Solomon was ever reinstated in Divine favor after his apostacy. A few inferences pro and con are sometimes resorted to by theologians who have contested this question, but they are not fully satisfactory.

Spirit Land.

O. D. GIBSON.

When a mariner is about to start on a voyage to some foreign land across the ocean, he has an idea where it is; but ere he starts he procures a chart, on which it is laid out in distinct colors, the latitude and longitude all clearly defined. He then sets his compass, and heads his vessel for the land as marked on his chart. He is all confidence and expectation. Why so? Simply because it is all clearly laid down and defined on his chart. He has just so many degrees of longitude and so many of latitude to make, and he is at his destined haven. He confides in his chart, therefore goes cheerily on. So it is with us in this life. We are mariners; we are sailing over life's sea: but where are we going? The common answer is, "To the spirit land." But where is that? One says, "It is beyond the bounds of time and space." Another, "It is in the third heavens, above the stars." Another still, "It is anywhere and everywhere around us in the air." But, my dear sirs, I wish to set my compass so as to make sure to gain the right port; will you please point it out on my chart, the Bible? I have been looking it over, and I can't find it laid down in any longitude or latitude whatever. What! no "spirit land" on your chart? I have often heard mariners, before they left port, say they were going there. True, I have never seen any one of them return, but surely I thought there was such a land. Well, what am I to do? My chart is the world renouned and accepted chart by all christian mariners, and no such land in all its longitudes or latitudes: what am I to do? Surely I am at a loss to tell you, as I am not familiar with the chart, but is there not a port somewhere over the sea called "Heaven," in a "far country," or country "far off" at the time the chart was made? Certainly that is here on the chart. Well is that not in "spirit land?" No, indeed, it is marked "New earth," First, dominion; "kingdom under the whole heaven," etc. Where on the sea is that? Well, it is clear over the sea of time. What, so far? I thought we only had to sail over a narrow river, called death, and we were there. Ah, no; there are several points marked on the chart after that before we enter the port of Heaven, also called "glory." Sit down here, let's take the chart and look at them. First, This life, situated in the land called "this present world," (Titus 2: 12,) Second, Death, which is in the "land of darkness," (Job 10: 21,) "land of forgetfulness," (Ps. 88: 12.) Third, Coming of the Lord from heaven. (1 Thes. 4: 16.) Fourth, Resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust. (Acts 24: 15.) Fifth, Judgment. (2 Tim. 4: 1.) Sixth, Execution of the same on the wicked. (Jude 14, 15.) As these last four are close together, and are passed in quick succession, they are marked "end of this world," (Mat. 13: 40.) When we have passed this last port, we part company with the wicked, for they all stop here. Their vessels are only [illegible] chartered to this port. This is very prominently marked on the chart. It is called "Perdition." (2 Pet. 3: 7.) Also "Destruction." (2 Thes. 1: 9.) Second Death, (Rev. 2: 11; 20: 14; 21: 8.) When this port is past, then the land heaves in sight, which is marked the port of Heaven (See Ps. 37: 34.)

"He shall exalt thee to inherit the land; when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it" (the land.) (Also Mat 13: 40–43.) That this is the last port ere we reach the "Heavenly country" (Heb. 11: 16,) let us look at the chart again in this Psalm 37: 9 ver. "For evils doers shall be cut off." This is at the port of "destruction." (Is. 1: 28, Job 31: 3.) "But those that wait on the Lord shall inherit the earth." (See also verses 22, 28, 29, 38, Also Prov. 2: 21, 22; Is. 24: 6; 2 Pet. 3: 10–13.) This is not "spirit land" but real terra firma, real land, as much so as this i[illegible] which we now dwell as pilgri[illegible] strangers. We are to be as re[illegible] substantial as we are to-day; or [illegible] head is, so will his body be. So we are not to be spirits in a spirit land when we enter death, but its dark outlines visible in the horizon all the voyage till the end of time, when the wave of oblivion shall roll over it and its king forever. (Heb. 2: 14.) Soon our Pilot at masthead will hail, "Land ho!" then all the crew will crowd on deck to see our heavenly home. Even so come, Lord Jesus.

Ashamed of Christ's Words.

"Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words," says Jesus, "of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels." (Luke 9: 26.) This solemn and impressive utterance seems to be practically forgotten by many who stand connected with the pulpit or the press to minister in holy things. At the recent consecration of Benj. H. Paddock, D.D., of Brooklyn, as Bishop of the Diocese of Massachusetts, Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania, who preached the sermon, thus touched on the point:

"It must be confessed that there is a great tendency at the present in all the ranks of the ministry to seek the approval of man. There is a shrinking from speaking out the truth in its fullness and power. Its sharp corners are rounded. Its strong doctrines are diluted; its warning voices are toned down. To approve ourselves unto God the mind must be filled with God's truth, the soul with Christ's love, and the whole man with the unction of the Holy Ghost."

These are true sayings, and deserve consideration. They remind us of some things we have seen in connection with the Advent movement. We have been told, for example that this or that minister holds pre-millennial views. Perhaps he does; but how many know it? Is there no yielding to the temptation—for the sake of salary, ease, or popularity—to be ashamed of Christ's "words?" To follow after the things which make for peace is indeed a duty—so far as we can do it and not displease God by a compromise of the truth; but it is "better to be saved in a storm than lost in a calm." To hold fast the truth on the second advent is well, but we should be careful not to hold it so fast as never to let it out.

"Worlds are changing, heaven beholding,
Thou hast but an hour to fight;
Now the blazoned cross unfolding,
On, right onward for the right!
On! let all the soul within you
For the truth's sake go abroad!
Strike! Let every nerve and sinew
Tell on ages, tell for God!"

"Buy the truth and sell it not," is the advice of the wise man. "Buy" it in Heaven's market, whatever it may cost, and "sell it not" for Earth's baubles of honor and ease. Now they may seem beautiful as the rainbow, but they will prove equally transient. "If we suffer with Christ," we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us." Think of it.—Advent Herald.

—One hundred and eighty-four thousand immigrants have landed in New York this year, from January to August, which indicates that there is scarcely a perceptible lessening of the restless current that sets towards the better land of America. Of this number, about sixty thousand came from Germany, fifty thousand from Ireland, and twenty thousand from England. The balance is contributed by almost every nation on the globe, the largest representations being as follows: Sweden, 7000; Scotland, 6000; Denmark, 5000; Norway, 4000; Italy, 4000; Switzerland, 3000; France, 2000; Holland, 3000; Russia, 2500; Wales, 1700; Austria, 1000.

England declined the proposition, but negotiations are now in progress with the German Postal Union, including Austria, and there is every probability that they will be brought to a successful issue by the first of next December. The draft of an additional postal convention for this purpose is now being prepared by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, and will be forwarded in a few days for the signature of the German authorities.

ABROAD.

—A dispatch from Havre, announces the death, near that city, of the Duke de Rianzares, the husband of Queen Christine of Spain.

—It is believed that Gen. Manteuffel will replace Count Von Arnim as the German Ambassador to France.

—A Paris journal (monarchical newspaper) says that a proposal for the restoration of the monarchy in France, on the basis of the Charter of 1814, will be presented in the Assembly on the opening of the session.

—A special to the world, dated London, Oct. 6, says: The Duc d'Aumale, to-day, privately said, it was certain that Marshal Bazaine would be condemned to death by the court-martial and then pardoned.

—The trial of Marshal Bazaine, by court-marshal, opened at noon, on Oct. 6, in the palace of Trianon. Duke d'Aumale, presided. Among the witnesses present were Marshals Canrobert and Leboeuf, and Gens. Frossard, Bourbaki, and Changarnier —Late dispatches received from Russia and Germany indicate an uneasy feeling in both those Governments, under apprehensions of a Polish Ultramontane rising. It is stated that an alliance has been cemented between the two Governments for the immediate and summary suppression of any movement by the Ultramontanists.

—The British Government has decided on destroying the Ashantees. By December the troops will be ready to take the field. Fifteen hundred additional European soldiers will be placed at the head of the existing force. After the Ashantee army has been defeated, a rapid march will be made upon the Capital Coomassie, which is to be destroyed.

—The Carlists are fast losing ground in the Northern Provinces in Spain. They are utterly demoralized, and the men accuse their leaders of treason. Gen. Moriones, commander of the Republican troops, is energetically advancing against them. The siege of Cartagena is proceeding actively, the firing being very sharp on both sides. Many of the insurrectionists surrender daily to the Republican forces.

—The press of Berlin is actively discussing the situation of political affairs in France, and the chances of a restoration of a monarchial form of government in that country. Considerable feeling is evinced in the tone of the articles written upon the subject, and a decided antagonism is manifest against the movements. The press generally consider the Count de Chambord's restoration to the French throne as certain, while they denounce it as a declaration of war against the whole modern Europe.

odhull, at Vineland, N. J., in favor of free- e doctrines; but according to the following tract from that lecture, it was not destitute points. It is wise to learn from an enemy. e lecturer has thrust back on her oppo- nts with fatal effect in these sentences:

"Why do you not, in place of asking what ll become of the children, ask what is be- ning of them now? Go ask the fifty thous l houseless, half starved, wholly untaught ildren of New York city, who live from the ill barrels of the rich Christians, what is coming of them, and they will tell you they n't know. But it will be plain to be seen at they are going to the bad, surely. I can not derstand how it is that the critics of social edom should be so terribly concerned about e children that are to be, when they have no ncern whatever for those who are. Solicit- de for children, when there are 5,000,000 of ople in the United States, one eighth of the tal population, over ten years of age, who n neither read nor write! Why, it is sim y absurd! There is no such thing. This etended solicitude is something pumped up the imagination of these idealists as a scare ow to prevent inquirers after freedom from nding the direct road."

Fraternal Feelings.

The following note, which we clip rom the Crisis, will explain itself:

A PARTING NOTE.

In my press of duties, I had almost forgotten hat I ought to say a few parting words to the eaders of the Crisis. Though my name has tood as corresponding editor of the Crisis up o the present time, my election as editor of he A. C. TIMES has so claimed my attention, hat I have not been able to write for the Crisis for some time. But I do not forget the lear old Crisis, nor have I lost my interest in ts prosperity; and I feel confident that this eeling is reciprocal—that the present editors of the Crisis rejoice in the prosperity of the TIMES; and I trust that the east and west will work together harmoniously. Had I chosen my successors, I could not have done better. The Crisis will prosper in the hands of such men as now manage it, and its readers will enjoy a constant feast.

After three years of official connection with the paper, I leave it to labor elsewhere. I leave it, so far as I know, with the best of feelings between myself and its present editors, and friends at large in the east. My thanks are due to those who reposed confidence in me, in electing me to the office which I have tried to fill in a manner to please God. My imperfections, I trust, will all be passed over, and a place still be granted me in your hearts, while I strive, in my weakness, to do good in another channel. A kind farewell to all. WM. SHELDON.

Yes, dear Br. Sheldon, you and the friends of the TIMES may be fully assured that we "rejoice" in its "prosperity," and that we stand ready to do what we can to promote the most perfect harmony between the east and the west. We trust our aims are one. We miss you much in the Crisis. May the Lord bless you richly, by giving you health, strength, wisdom, and holiness, suitable for your responsible position.—[EDITORS.]

Attention, Indiana.

The last Indiana Conference appointed two State evangelists—one to labor in the northern, and the other in the southern part of the State. Brother E. C. Andrus is to occupy the former, and brother Geo. W. Green the latter district. And now the next question is, How are they to be supported? We have but few churches in the State, and they are not numerically or financially strong. Still they can do something if they will try. Let every one, then, who wishes to see the truths we teach extensively disseminated throughout the State, in every town, and in the hedges and highways, in every neighborhood where there is a public school-house, or even a private house open to the good work, now lend a helping hand, and these brethren may be instrumental in the conversion of hundreds of perishing sinners. Churches will be gathered and set in order under their ministry, who will in turn contribute to the support of our evangelists, and thereby still further advance the cause of truth. They were instructed to solicit contributions to an evangelical fund, wherever they may hold protracted meetings, and keep an account of the same, and report the amount to the next annual conference.

These b[illegible]are in every respect worthy [illegible]onfidence of the people who [illegible]joy the benefit of their ministry; and I invoke for them the aid and sympathy of all who love the appearing and kingdom of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

President Ind. Advent Christian Conf.

On the Sick List.

Soon after the camp meeting at Utica brother George W. Miller, in company with his wife and children, took a trip up through the country with a view to attend some appointments, and be present at our meetings in Minneapolis. He took cold on the way, and came near being detained on account of it. He arrived at Minneapolis about the 26th of September, and was taken down sick immediately with typhoid fever. His sickness has caused him much pain and suffering. To-day (Oct. 7) he is out of danger, and getting better as fast as can be expected. He is at the home of brother and sister Desent, where he is having the best of care and medical aid. It will be some time, however, before he can take the field again as evangelist.

His desire is that the brethren of the State Conference should correspond with him. I trust the brethren will do so. Also let it be remembered that brother Miller will have doctors' bills to pay, and other expenses that attend as the result of sickness.

Brother Miller is one of the faithful pioneers in the western field, and now is the time for the lovers of Jesus to sen him some money; that will be help in time of need; don't delay—he needs it now if ever.

D. R. MANSFIELD.
Minneapolis, Oct. 7, 1873.

P.S.—His address is Minneapolis, Minn., in care of brother A. G. Desent.

[Remember brother Miller's needs—he is a servant of God.—ED. TIMES.]

"The Well of Souls."

In a description of the Mosque of Omar, and its appendages, given by the Rev. S. Graves, D. D., on his tour to the Holy Land, reference is made to a rock deemed sacred by the Mohammedans, in these words:

> This rock is held to be the identical spot on which Abraham offered Isaac, to have been directly beneath the Holy of Holies in the Temple of Solomon, and that upon it stood the Ark of the Covenant and the Cherubim, whose wings over spread the Mercy Seat; while the Mohammedan maintains that from this rock Mohammed ascended to heaven, and to dissipate all doubt, shows you the print of his foot in the surface of the rock, and also the print of the angel Gabriel's hand, which was placed upon the rock to prevent it from following the prophet!
> Beneath this rock are several caves, artificial and natural, with which are connected the names of David, Solomon, Elijah, and Mohammed. One of these contains an opening into the immense subterranean vault. This opening is called the Well of Souls, where one may converse with the spirits of the departed.

So the Mohammedans have a well to keep souls in—not a well of water, but a "well of souls"—down under a big rock. There souls can talk, it is said. If they can't, some Mohammedan can talk for them.

Short Editorials.

The editor of the Baptist Weekly speaks about short editorials in a strain that is not far out of the way, as a general rule, allowing occasional exceptions; and the same principle holds good in other articles, for tediousness is a detriment every where. We quote the following item:

> A good brother, fearfully addicted to preaching long sermons, lately requested that we give gre[illegible] to our editorials. Their quality [illegible]proved in the very suggesti[illegible] wanted more of the same so[illegible] In [illegible] however, we shall do as we have been doing, i. e., say in the shortest space possible what we have to say, wasting no words and assuming that our readers will be better served with brief suggestions than with long dissertations. In newspaper articles, as in preaching, it is well to assume that some things are known and need not be written. We go for brevity, and if any of our readers want tedious editorial essays we would advise them to send their subscriptions to some of our contemporaries who excel in this line. As for ourselves we shall still endeavor to be sound, sharp, and short.

Solomon a Backslider.

BRO. SHELDON:—Will you please give your views on the 11th Chap of 1 Kings?

Does the Bible give any account of Solomon repenting of his sins before he died, or not?

J. W. BURRITT.

WE know of no positive proof that Solomon was ever reinstated in Divine favor after his apostacy. A few inferences pro and con are sometimes resorted to by theologians who have contested this question, but they are not fully satisfactory.

Spirit Land.

O. D. GIBSON.

When a mariner is about to start on a voyage to some foreign land across the ocean, he has an idea where it is; but ere he starts he procures a chart, on which it is laid out in distinct colors, the latitude and longitude all clearly defined. He then sets his compass, and heads his vessel for the land as marked on his chart. He is all confidence and expectation. Why so? Simply because it is all clearly laid down and defined on his chart. He has just so many degrees of longitude and so many of latitude to make, and he is at his destined haven. He confides in his chart, therefore goes cheerily on. So it is with us in this life. We are mariners; we are sailing over life's sea: but where are we going? The common answer is, "To the spirit land." But where is that? One says, "It is beyond the bounds of time and space." Another, "It is in the third heavens, above the stars." Another still, "It is anywhere and everywhere around us in the air." But, my dear sirs, I wish to set my compass so as to make sure to gain the right port; will you please point it out on my chart, the Bible? I have been looking it over, and I can't find it laid down in any longitude or latitude whatever. What! no "spirit land" on your chart? I have often heard mariners, before they left port, say they were going there. True, I have never seen any one of them return, but surely I thought there was such a land. Well, what am I to do? My chart is the world renowned and accepted chart by all christian mariners, and no such land in all its longitudes or latitudes: what am I to do? Surely I am at a loss to tell you, as I am not familiar with the chart, but is there not a port somewhere over the sea called "Heaven," in a "far country," or country "far off" at the time the chart was made? Certainly that is here on the chart. Well is that not in "spirit land?" No, indeed, it is marked "New earth." First, dominion; "kingdom under the whole heaven," etc. Where on the sea is that? Well, it is clear over the sea of time. What, so far? I thought we only had to sail over a narrow river, called death, and we were there. Ah, no; there are several points marked on the chart after that before we enter the port of Heaven, also called "glory." Sit down here, let's take the chart and look at them. First, This life, situated in the land called "this present world," (Titus 2: 12,) Second, Death, which is in the "land of darkness," (Job 10: 21,) "land of forgetfulness," (Ps. 88: 12.) Third, Coming of the Lord from heaven. (1 Thes. 4: 16.) Fourth, Resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust. (Acts 24: 15.) Fifth, Judgment. (2 Tim. 4: 1.) Sixth, Execution of the same on the wicked. (Jude 14, 15.) As these last four are close together, and are passed in quick succession, they are marked "end of this world," (Mat. 13: 40.) When we have passed this last port, we part company with the wicked, for they all stop here. Their vessels are only [illegible] chartered to this port. This is very prominently marked on the chart. It is called "Perdition." (2 Pet. 3: 7.) Also "Destruction." (2 Thes. 1: 9.) Second Death, (Rev. 2: 11; 20: 14; 21: 8.) When this port is past, then the land heaves in sight, which is marked the port of Heaven (See Ps. 37: 34.)

"He shall exalt thee to inherit the land; when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it" (the land.) (Also Mat 13: 40–43.) That this is the last port ere we reach the "Heavenly country" (Heb. 11: 16,) let us look at the chart again in this Psalm 37: 9 ver. "For evils doers shall be cut off." This is at the port of "destruction." (Is. 1: 28, Job 31: 3.) "But those that wait on the Lord shall inherit the earth." (See also verses 22, 28, 29, 38, Also Prov. 2: 21, 22; Is. 24: 6; 2 Pet. 3: 10–13.) This is not "spirit land" but real terra firma, real land, as much so as this ir which we now dwell as pilgri[illegible] rangers. We are to be as re[illegible] ubstantial as we are to-day; or [illegible] head is, so will his body be. So we are not to be spirits in a spirit land when we enter death, but its dark outlines visible in the horizon all the voyage till the end of time, when the wave of oblivion shall roll over it and its king forever. (Heb. 2: 14.) Soon our Pilot at masthead will hail, "Land ho!" then all the crew will crowd on deck to see our heavenly home. Even so come, Lord Jesus.

Ashamed of Christ's Words.

"Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words," says Jesus, "of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels." (Luke 9: 26.) This solemn and impressive utterance seems to be practically forgotten by many who stand connected with the pulpit or the press to minister in holy things. At the recent consecration of Benj. H. Paddock, D.D., of Brooklyn, as Bishop of the Diocese of Massachusetts, Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania, who preached the sermon, thus touched on the point:

"It must be confessed that there is a great tendency at the present in all the ranks of the ministry to seek the approval of man. There is a shrinking from speaking out the truth in its fullness and power. Its sharp corners are rounded. Its strong doctrines are diluted; its warning voices are toned down. To approve ourselves unto God the mind must be filled with God's truth, the soul with Christ's love, and the whole man with the unction of the Holy Ghost."

These are true sayings, and deserve consideration. They remind us of some things we have seen in connection with the Advent movement. We have been told, for example that this or that minister holds pre-millennial views. Perhaps he does; but how many know it? Is there no yielding to the temptation—for the sake of salary, ease, or popularity—to be ashamed of Christ's "words?" To follow after the things which make for peace is indeed a duty—so far as we can do it and not displease God by a compromise of the truth; but it is "better to be saved in a storm than lost in a calm." To hold fast the truth on the second advent is well, but we should be careful not to hold it so fast as never to let it out.

"Worlds are changing, heaven beholding,
Thou hast but an hour to fight;
Now the blazoned cross unfolding,
On, right onward for the right!
On! let all the soul within you
For the truth's sake go abroad!
Strike! Let every nerve and sinew
Tell on ages, tell for God!"

"Buy the truth and sell it not," is the advice of the wise man. "Buy" it in Heaven's market, whatever it may cost, and "sell it not" for Earth's baubles of honor and ease. Now they may seem beautiful as the rainbow, but they will prove equally transient. "If we suffer with Christ," we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us." Think of it.—Advent Herald.

—The yellow fever has appeared in an epidemic form at Calvert, Texas. Forty-two cases were reported Oct. 5. The wildest excitement prevails.

—The drought in Maine causes lower water in the Penobscot River than has been known since 1835, and the Kennebec and other rivers and streams are unusually low.

—The store of Henry A. Jaquits, at Medford, Mass., was entered Friday night by burglars, who blew open the safe and escaped with $12,000 worth of railroad bonds and $100 in greenbacks.

—Baltimore, Md.—Hamilton's grocery and Shaffer's pork-packing establishment were damaged to the amount of $25,000 by fire, on the 6th of Oct. Insurance, $20,000.

—The Modocs, Captain Jack, Schonchin, Black Jim, and Boston Charley, were hanged at Fort Klamath, Oct. 3, at 10 o'clock. The sentences of Barncho and Sloluk, who were also to have expiated their crimes with Capt. Jack and his comrades, were commuted by the President to imprisonment for life. On being informed of this fact the two fortunate Modocs were overcome with the liveliest joy, while a deeper depression was observed to settle on the faces of their fellow prisoners.

—One hundred and eighty-four thousand immigrants have landed in New York this year, from January to August, which indicates that there is scarcely a perceptible lessening of the restless current that sets towards the better land of America. Of this number, about sixty thousand came from Germany, fifty thousand from Ireland, and twenty thousand from England. The balance is contributed by almost every nation on the globe, the largest representations being as follows: Sweden, 7000; Scotland, 6000; Denmark, 5000; Norway, 4000; Italy, 4000; Switzerland, 3000; France, 2000; Holland, 3000; Russia, 2500; Wales, 1700; Austria, 1000.

—Sometime ago the Post-Office Department invited the postal authorities of England and Germany to open negotiations with this country for the interchange of postal cards on a basis of the two-cent rate. England declined the proposition, but negotiations are now in progress with the German Postal Union, including Austria, and there is every probability that they will be brought to a successful issue by the first of next December. The draft of an additional postal convention for this purpose is now being prepared by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, and will be forwarded in a few days for the signature of the German authorities.

Correspondence.

West Virginia and Southern Ohio Conference.

The fourth annual session of the West Va. and Southern Ohio A. C. Conference convened with the Poca Fork church, Sept. 6, 1873.

Brn. A. Pauley, T. McCuen and D. Covey were elected a committee on preaching.

Brn. D. N. Foster and D. G. Looney committee on prayer meeting.

After reading of credentials and calling roll of members, we proceeded to appoint a committee to receive and arrange business for the action of the conference. M. Hively, J. Chambers and D. Covey were elected.

We then heard the address of the President as follows:

Dear Brethren—Another year with its cares and toils, its joys and sorrows, has past. Once more do we assemble to consult each other about the cause we love. May Heaven's richest blessing rest upon us. May our conference be conducted with an eye single to the glory of our Heavenly Father.

What good has been accomplished within the past year, within the bounds of our conference, eternity will reveal. I trust some, though not as much as we could wish. I would suggest that we consecrate ourselves anew to the work: let us, as preachers and people, draw nigh unto God, that he may draw nigh to us. Are we awake to the great importance of our work? Are our lamps trimmed, are they burning? Brethren beloved, suffer the word of exhortation: "Quit you like men;" "be strong;" "occupy;" "work while the day lasts." Amen.

Treasurer reported $15 25 collected on tent fund.

On examination of Christian character of ministers, all were commended.

Reports of ministers.—S. P. Whitney.—As your evangelist during the past year I have spent a large share of my time in the field. The greater part of the summer was spent outside of our conference bounds. I have held several interesting meetings, one in Ohio with Br. Scott, of the Christian church. I will say by way of explanation, that Br. Scott and the church with whom he labors, although not known by the same denominational name, are established in the present truth which we hold dear, knowing how to suffer for the name of Christ, and to count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of him. May they hold fast whereunto they have attained, and grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. Through Br. B. S. Young I was introduced into Greenbriar Co., a new field, where I held several interesting meetings, received several subscribers for our western paper, and distributed a number of tracts, hoping that some seed may have fallen on good ground, to bring forth fruit to the glory of God, thirty, sixty, and an hundred fold. I have traveled about 2,000 miles, preached and lectured 142 times, and received about $158 in clothing, provisions, and cash.

M. Hammack.—Had the care of two churches. Preached in five counties. Moved my family from the vicinity of the Round Knob church to Hayes. Made a small crop, traveled 800 miles, preached 100 sermons, and received about $60 for my support in the gospel mission.

J. R. S. Mowrey.—Had the care of two churches. Traveled 2,310 miles, preached 119 sermons, delivered three lectures, labored for the cause in five counties, baptized eight souls, and received $39 80 for my services.

D. N. Foster.—Traveled 150 miles, preached thirty sermons, labored some in Sunday schools, made a good crop.

D. Hammack.—Traveled about 800 miles, preached thirty-two sermons, and received two dollars and fifty cents.

D. G. Looney.—Traveled and preached some during the year.

Wm. Ferrell.—Labored for the cause a portion of the time.

Reports of churches.—Poca Fork, seventeen members, four additions.

Hayes Fork, thirty-one members, twelve additions, and one fallen asleep in Jesus.

Mt. Pleasant, fifty members, no additions, and one fallen asleep.

West Fork, fifteen members, and seven additions.

Round Knob, twenty five members, two additions.

Dulls Creek, fourteen members, no additions, one fell asleep.

Fields Creek, (represented by letter,) fifteen members, no additions, have had no preaching, still united.

Coon Creek, thirty members, no additions.

Rose Valley, (represented by S. P. Whitney,) on account of members moving to different portions of the country they have been hindered from meeting together, eight members still in the faith.

Chambersburg, Ohio, thirty members, have a pastor, still holding fast to the faithful word.

License was granted D. G. Looney to preach the word of life; also D. N. Foster, who came recommended by the Poca Fork church, was granted license.

Resolutions adopted: Resolved, That we as a conference recommend to the several churches the necessity of an earnest effort to procure a tent for the use of the conference.

Resolved, That J. R. S. Mowrey be recommended to the people as a minister of the gospel, worthy of their attention.

S. P. Whitney was elected president, Meredith Hammack vice president, M. Hively treasurer, and B. S Young secretary for the ensuing year.

Adjourned to meet, the Lord willing, Sept. 4, 1874, with the Round Knob A. C. church.

Our meetings, which were conducted under unfavorable circumstances, were refreshing to the saints, and there were manifestations of conviction on the part of sinners. Two were buried with our living Head, with the glorious prospect of a speedy deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God as expressed by their rising again from their watery graves.

Many spoke comforting words to the waiting ones. Praise the Lord for the consolation afforded by the gospel to poor waiting Zion.

Let us all be strong in the strength that never shall fail. S. P. Whitney, Pres.

J. R. S. Mowrey, Sec.

South-West Missouri Conference.

Met, agreeable to notice, at the Oak Grove school house, near Hudson, Bates Co., Mo., Sept. 6, 1873 And though friends in Taberville disappointed us, yet we were refreshed by the presence of Br. L. H. Little, of Johnson Co., who assisted in dispensing the word. We had also a good delegation from Vernon County.

The report from all directions indicated there was an interest to hear: many calls for preaching, but a lack of laborers. Therefore the anxious request, "send us a preacher who will feed us the truth," is heard ringing out on the empty air, without a responsive echo. And our hearts are often saddened when from ill health, or from our inability to occupy two places at the same time, we cannot respond to these calls.

After consultation it was concluded best for the cause of God that we organize a conference, and the following constitution was adopted:

ARTICLE I.

This organization shall be called the South-West Missouri Advent Christian Conference.

ARTICLE II.

The object of this conference shall be to promote Scriptural piety, harmony, co-operation and efficiency in publishing the Scriptures of truth, and especially Scripture which relates to the soon coming kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

ARTICLE III.

This conference shall be composed of preachers, members of churches represented, and delegates of all churches who may wish to act with this conference, each church having power to send five delegates, visiting brethren being made eligible to a sitting by vote of conference.

ARTICLE IV.

The officers of this conference shall consist of a president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer, who shall be elected by ballot, and likewise be ex-officio members of the board: and continue in office until others are appointed.

ARTICLE V.

The conference shall meet semi annually, or oftener, at such time and place as shall have been previously arranged by conference.

ARTICLE VI.

The order of the annual conference shall be:

1. To organize and receive new members.
2. To choose officers for the ensuing year.
3. Appoint a business committee to devise and present business for the action of the conference, the conference taking such action and adopting such ways and means as shall seem most wise for the promotion of divine truth.
4. Hear the report of the board.
5. Hear the reports of churches and preachers.
6. Appoint a board of directors, in harmony with Article 8, and transact any other business proper to come before the conference.

The order of the other sessions shall be the same as the annual, with the exception of the omission of reports from preachers, churches, the board, and the election of officers.

ARTICLE VII.

This conference shall have no legislative power over the churches—shall be only advisory to them. Each member of the conference shall be entitled to an impartial hearing, but no member shall have authority to speak upon any point more than three times without permission from the president: and all preachers of this conference shall be held amenable to the same for their moral conduct, and the conference may withdraw fellowship from any they may deem unworthy of the same.

ARTICLE VIII.

This conference shall appoint by ballot three brethren, who, with the president and secretary, shall compose the board of directors, whose duty it shall be to have charge of all the funds raised by the conference, ascertain the wants as to preaching, camp, and protracted meetings, etc., of the respective churches of this conference, and as far as possible, provide for such wants; call the conference when not otherwise called, and transact such other business as the conference may deem wise; at all times being subject to the direction of the conference, and shall faithfully report whatever they may do to the ensuing conference.

ARTICLE IX

Preachers passing the examination of this conference shall report at each annual session in person or by letter, and receive letters of commendation for the ensuing year; and a neglect to do so shall be considered a sufficient reason for withholding said letter of commendation.

ARTICLE X.

This constitution may be revised or amended by a vote of two thirds of all the members present at any regular or appointed session, except this article.

The following brethren were elected officers of the conference: W. W. Cate, Pres.; Tho. F. Fry, Vice Pres.; L. J. Rich, Sec., and S. Bush, Treas.

Br. Wm. E. Moss was publicly set apart by ordination to the work of the gospel ministry; and we regret that he expects soon to leave us, and will settle in Ottowa Co., Kan.

Decided to hold the next session of conference at the Washington S. H., four miles north of Nevada City, Vernon Co., Mo., to commence Friday before the second Sunday in Dec. next.

Brethren, this is an important field, and one long neglected; our great want is ministerial labor. Who will volunteer to come over and help us? Any minister in good standing who wishes to find a field of labor in the southwest, please correspond with our vice president, Tho. F. Fry, at Nevada City, Mo., or W. W. Cate, Hudson, Bates Co., Mo. We don't want hobby riders.

The harvest truly is great but the laborers are few. Who will come and tell the people that Jesus is coming soon? Many never heard the proclamation.

Mich. Conference--Northern Dist.

The first Q. M. for the current year was held with the church in Hinton, Sept. 25-8, 1873.

Ministers present,—J. Bower, R. Burtenshaw, D. Weaver, W. Wheeler, and L. C. Collins, of Chicago, also Br. A. W. Tucker, Business Agent.

Conference called to order Friday, Sept. 26, 10 o'clock a. m. After devotional exercises, it was voted that the committees be appointed by the chair.

Business committee.—E. B. Scott, A. W. Lambson, and L. W. King.

Nominating committee.—W. Wheeler, L. F. Bower, and R. Burtenshaw.

Devotional committee.—L. S. Hulet, H. H. Fellows, and L. F. Bower.

Adjourned to meet Sat. morning at 9 a. m., when the conference was called to order by the chair.

Heard the treasurer's report; $17.88 in the treasury.

The nominating committee reported old officers. Report received and committee discharged. The officers were re-elected by ballot: J. Bower, Chairman; E. B. Scott, Sec.; A. W. Lambson, Treas.

The reports of ministers and churches showed there is an effort being put forth for the advancement of the cause of Christ in this district. All felt encouraged to press forward. The subject of sustaining the cause and enlarging our borders in this new field was brought up and discussed at some length.

Appropriate remarks and suggestions were made by Brn. Collins, Tucker, and others, which resulted in the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas, Realizing that time is short, and that we have a great work before us, therefore,

Resolved: That we wake up and engage more earnestly in this great work, and give liberally of our means, and do all we can to spread the truth, and bring sinners to Christ.

It was voted that the money now in the treasury be expended in defraying expenses of preaching brethren attending the Wexford conference. This being a new field, it was considered as a missionary enterprise.

Br. Burtenshaw offered to furnish each church in the district with a missionary box for the collection of the missionary fund. This offer was accepted, and the boxes will be furnished.

This Q. M. was largely attended all through The interest was intense; several expressed a desire to become Christians. We think much prejudice was removed from the minds of many. We look for good results from this meeting. At the close, a goodly number sat around the Lord's table. This was a blessed season, one to be remembered; after which came the good-byes, and God bless you.

Left home for Leon Aug. 28. Reached Br. Brandt's Friday, 29. Preached that evening, Saturday evening and twice on Sunday. There was an excellent interest, partly from the fruit of the Sparta camp meeting, and partly by a prayer meeting kept up in the place. We baptized four young people, and think if the meeting could have been continued a few days more, others would have obeyed. To God's great name be all the glory.

I mention this to show the importance of maintaining the prayer meeting everywhere.

From Sr. Ruth M. Rowell.

Aug. 28 finished my wanderings in Boston, by visiting her city markets, where food is dealt out to such a moving mass of people, then lingering awhile in Faniuel Hall, examining its many fine portraits of English and American gentlemen, celebrated in the annals of American history, some in ancient and some in modern costume; and while looking at the contrast of the two centuries, and the great simplicity, convenience, and appropriateness of the citizen's dress in comparison with the style of the English chevalier's costume, I expressed to my companions the hope that, should time continue, woman would profit by their example, and lay aside fripperies, and foolish and cumbersome fashions, and, agreeable to the mind of the apostle, "adorn themselves with modest apparel." Became deeply interested in the celebrated picture of Danl. Webster in his great speech to his peers, and its renowned inscription, "Liberty and union now and forever."

Then visited the several wharves, and examined the shipping of this great city by the sea, and passed as long a time as I could possibly spare on Long Wharf, gazing out upon the deep blue sea, and ships, yachts, schooners, and sloops sailing off to other lands, working their way like beings of life through the mighty deep, the waves closing behind them and leaving unmarred its ever rolling murmuring billows. And as I sat I mused upon that time in God's eternity when he measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and said, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed;" since which time it has served its important work as a great thoroughfare of the nations of the earth. But we are nearing the grand epoch of time when from out its vasty deep, at the call of the Son of man, shall emerge its buried dead, and old ocean itself, decomposed, shall help swell the fires of the last conflagration from which, like the phoenix from its ashes, shall rise the new earth, concerning which we read: "And there shall be no more sea."

Sept. 29. Arrived at the Springfield camp ground, and was kindly welcomed by Srs. Jennings and Stoddard, but passed a very sick night that night, was however very thankful when morning came to be so much better as to be able to attend preaching at the stand. Mrs. Ellis gave me a home in her tent, which was in a very pleasant and retired part of the ground, as well as very comfortable, and treated me with great kindness, until Sr. Anna Smith, of the New York mission arrived, when I made my home with her to my great satisfaction. She is a noble hearted woman, of large capabilities, well versed in self sacrifice and toil, and through it all beams a true woman's heart of kindness and affection. God bless her in her labors of love.

The Springfield camp meeting was a blessed one. The Lord was there, and it was a heavenly sitting together in Christ Jesus. It was quite interesting to me to see the faces and hear the voices of so many Adventist preachers whom I had never met with before. I tried very hard to fix their physiognomies and style of speaking in my mind so that I could remember each distinctly in after years, but without succeeding in some cases. I can not express the great comfort it was to me to meet so many female preachers, and enjoy their society, as I was privileged to do through the progress of this meeting. The committee gave us the use of a large tent for a union meeting of the preaching sisters one morning, and it was a precious season in the Lord. One gentleman present came and took me by the hand saying he had never before believed in female preaching, but he was convinced of the truthfulness of their mission now. This meeting had shown things to him in a different light from what he had seen them before.

Monday, Sept. 1. Broke camp, when this large family of believers from different states, convened here in a national camp meeting, went their several ways, some to meet no more until the grand roll is called in the closing events of time. Away they go to the duties and cares of their several fields of labor, sped onward by the iron horse, divergent ways, some to the prairies and valleys west of the Mississippi, to labor and watch and pray, in Kansas and Minnesota, or wherever, in that western land where souls are perishing for the lack of knowledge, God may call them to do and to suffer for Christ. Ah, when I think of some who seem to think more of the fleece than the flock, who think more of the pleasant surroundings, the comforts and the salaries they receive, than where there is the most suffering, the most wickedness, the greatest poverty, the most need of the bread and water of life to be given to the famishing sons and daughters of men—when I observe these things, I am forcibly struck with the words of God concerning Paul, (Acts 9: 16,) that "chosen vessel of the Lord," able to stand before kings and mighty men of the Jewish and Gentile nation, "I will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." Others of this family to Florida, and on the hills of Alabama, and in the Carolinas, holding up the blood-stained banner of the cross, and striving to win a bride for their Master. God bless these earnest and efficient laborers in those southern fields.

Others in the middle states, the Canadas, and dear old New England—different individuals engaged in different fields, but working for one great cause, and all needing great grace, deep humility, with unwavering trust in God, constant prayer, and willingness to do and suffer for Christ. All laboring in the great harvest of souls—all to come bye and bye and bring their sheaves with them, and receive glory, not from short sighted men, but from God. The Judge of all the earth, will not he do right? Ah! that searching time, that eventful day that shall try men's hearts when many that are first will be last, and some that are last shall be first.

Sept 7. Eld. W. Hobbs and myself held a meeting in a pretty grove in his uncle's field on the banks of the beautiful Bearcamp river, among the magnificent hills of Ossipee. It was a good day in the Lord. Met with many who had listened to the preaching of my father who now sleeps in the sunny south, and my deceased mother who rests among these magnificent hills. How gladly these people welcomed me amid falling tears, and words of kindness concerning my deceased parents, and their labors in the Lord.

Sad memories stirred my soul as I entered the once happy home of Br. Ezra Hobbs, and my own sister Maria, now cold in death, and looked into the faces of the three precious children left by them fatherless and motherless, to wander this wicked world without a parent's care. While they lived their home was the pilgrim's home. May those ministers of Christ whom they sheltered, and those brethren and sisters who always found a welcome home here, and well-spread table and everything done that could be done for their temporal wants, may those ministers remember these orphaned children, and pray our Heavenly Father that they may be kept from the paths of sin.

Sept. 8. Visited the graves of my brother and sister, where they sleep side by side with their two little children. "They were lovely in their lives and in death they are not divided." Blessed be their memories.

Sept. 9. Started for Alton Bay camp meeting. Stopped at Wolfborough Bridge a few hours, and dined with Mrs. Kuniston, the landlady of the Lake House, and a relative of mine. It was a precious interview. In the afternoon took the boat Mount Washington for Alton Bay, the finest boat which plays on Winnepesaukee Lake, the most beautiful lake and among the most picturesque scenery of all New England. We landed near the camp ground, and soon stood in the tented ground and I thanked God that the long cherished desire of my heart was accomplished in standing at last upon this consecrated ground, and being privileged to enjoy one of its annual feasts. Several families have been on the ground for a number of weeks, enjoying the pleasant surroundings, and meetings have been progressing for some time; hence everything is now in excellent working order.

I was assigned a room which the committee had caused to be prepared expressly for the preaching sisters. It was a pleasant room, elevated and airy, and gave us an excellent view of the main promenade from the boat landing and depot to the preaching stand.

Sr. Hattie Hastings, of the southern mission, whose labors have been so greatly blessed in the Lord, was my night companion. My heart warmed at once toward this devoted servant of God—the very atmosphere around her seemed holy. Pleasant to me will ever be the memories of this association. Sr. Anna Smith, of the garrets and cellars of New York, the consecrated Julia Buswell, and her excellent companion Sr. Douglass, with other choice spirits, helped to make up this happy family, which in sweet union in this "upper chamber" enjoyed this feast of tabernacles.

This Alton Bay camp ground is excellent, both in the lay of the land, and its locality. Its proximity to the depot of the railroad, and the landing of the boat, is a great convenience to goers and comers, and great attention is given by Br. Couch and all others concerned, to leave nothing undone for the comfort and convenience of all in attendance.

I never met with Eld. Couch until I saw him at Springfield camp meeting, when I was at once impressed by his commanding appearance, as also by his efficiency [illegible] ability as a preacher. At this Alton Ba[illegible]ing, where he was a leading man and ear[illegible]er, my previous convictions were confirm[illegible] and I down deep in my heart that he was a true thful, consecrated servant of God. Thank d for such men at the head of the ranks, d may God help all those who love our God th sincerity of heart and unity of purpose hold up their hands.

This is a great, I had almost said monstrous eting. Such masses of people ever going, r coming, yet all kept under excellent con l by the committee of arrangements. I en ed this meeting much, although my health uld not permit me to attend all the preach meetings, and but few of the devotional s, still the Lord was there and I felt his sence everywhere.

Sept. 12. Took a trip with friends across e beautiful Lake Winnepesaukee. The day s fine, and the scene exquisitely beautiful we sailed out among the green islands over se placid waters. We looked out in the ke of the boat upon the sheeted surge and m of the boat's track, all bright, glistening der the noon day sun, and then upon its tted islands, its surrounding hills and dales l rock-bound shore, and the words of the et came to my mind:

h, go to the spot so sublime and so fair,
w the mountains, the woodlands, the hills that are there:
n say if a spot can be found more sublime, an Winnepesaukee, those regions of thine."

A Case of Healing.

[By request of Dr. L. C. Rice, of ticago, we copy the following from e Crisis, of Oct. 2.—Ed. Times.]

Miraculous Healing.—The following remarkable case of healing is most ly tested by the husband, Bro. M. erman, a Methodist minister at Pier ont, N. H., by Sr. O. D. Eastman, ndaff, N. H., and Mrs. Hiram Clark, sister of the one healed. We received e following note from Bro. Sherman, ien at Alton Bay Camp meeting:—

"Piermont, N. H., Sept. 9th, 1873

Eld M. Grant:—Dear Bro.—I send here th a communication from my wife, which would like to have read from the stand, d also published in the Crisis, if in your lgment it will be for the honor of the Mas and the good of souls. I fully endorse all e has written. I am clearly satisfied that it s truly a miracle as any wrought by the ne Jesus when on earth in his flesh. I am t personally acquainted with you, although have heard you preach, and frequently see Crisis. Though belonging to another de mination, we love all who love our Lord sus Christ, and have many dear friends of Advent faith. Would refer you to Elder D. Eastman and wife of Landaff, N. H., w at the meeting; and Mrs. Hiram Clark, sister of my wife, through whom we send s, also of Landaff, stopping at Sugar Hill t; also to Elder T. W. Piper, of Tufton rough, N. H. Yours in christian love,

M. Sherman."

As Sr. Eastman made a statement of e case before a large audience in the bernacle, it was thought not best to ad the following which was after ards received:—

Dear brethren and sisters in Christ, sembled at Alton Bay Camp meet g:—For the honor of the name of rist, and the confirmation of your th in him, I would like to relate you a recent wonderful and mir ulous manifestation of his power in y behalf. I am the wife of Moses erman, a member of the N. H. con rence of the M. E. church, and pas r of the society in Piermont, N. H. have been a professed disciple of rist twenty-one years, but have been very unprofitable servant. I have en a great sufferer for fifteen years m spinal and other chronic troubles, hich completely undermined my alth and constitution, causing severe rvous prostration, and derangement the entire system; so that in the inion of at least one physician I was diseased all over. Everything led me." For nearly a year (from e 10th of Sept. 1872, to Aug. 28th, 73), I was wholly confined to my d, unable to move from it without lp, or stand on my feet, or be ised to a standing posture even thout other strength than mine. I as really "bowed down" with sick ss. My spine was exceedingly sore d sensitive. This sensitiveness fected my whole nervous system, so at I was a burden to myself, and a great care to my friends. During the spring months I was sorely afflicted with inflammation of the surrounding membranes of the spinal cord and brain, causing derangement of mind, and bringing me near the grave apparently. In these years I have been examined and treated by several able physicians, who all agreed in pronouncing my case an incurable one; and, that at the best, I must always be a great sufferer. I was growing more helpless, and much of the time during the summer it has required two persons to move me.

On the night of the 28th of Aug. last, I was in unusually great distress of body. I had given up to be a bedridden invalid; but felt that I could not bear this life burden without more assistance from my heavenly Father. I wanted to be a perfectly resigned sufferer, bearing with patience and sweetness all his will. I wanted to say from my heart, Thy will, not mine. I tried, and was divinely helped, I believe, to fully surrender myself, and all my cares and burdens, into the hands of Jesus, to be passive there, and do and suffer all his will.

When I felt that the consecration was complete, it was easy to claim Jesus as my Saviour. As my faith reached out to grasp him, I began to be conscious of his presence in my room, and I heard his voice speaking to my inner ear, saying, "I will come unto you, and will manifest myself unto you." I saw no form, but I knew Jesus was there. I felt his presence, and knew he saved even me. I said, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." O, the cleansing power I felt! It seemed that I could not have him depart and leave me alone, and I prayed him to give me the Comforter to abide with me forever. It was instantly given, going through my entire being like an electric shock, accompanied by the words, "Refining fire go through my heart," etc. I was overpowered, and lost in wonder, love, and praise, though perfectly mute, and I felt that a life of torture would be bliss, if Jesus would thus show his smiling face; for up to this time I had no thought of anything else but to spend the rest of my life in extreme suffering of body. But, as I lay humbled in the dust before his matchless love and grace to such a poor sinner, the thought "this body is a poor offering to make in return for such a blessing, for a "temple of the Spirit," crossed my mind. It was suggested, "He is able to restore it, and fit it up for his own temple." At once the voice of Jesus whispered, "Believest thou that I am able to do this?" This was repeated many times, while I examined the grounds for such a confidence. My judgment was convinced that not only was he able, but abundantly willing. Power to believe was given. My whole heart cried out, "Lord I believe; help thou mine unbelief." Then he whispered, "And he breathed on them and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost," and at the same time, I felt a warming influence, like some one breathing upon my face. This was continual, and extended through my whole body. It was like a current from a galvanic battery, warming and strengthening me. Soon my pain left me, and I turned in bed without effort. Then came the word, "Call your husband and tell him." I did so, and while telling him that the Saviour was present healing me, there came the words of Christ to the sick of the palsy, "And that the people may know that the Son of man hath power still on earth to forgive sins,....Rise up and walk!" I rose and walked at one o'clock at night across my room several times without assistance; and, truly, as I walked, I praised God! My "feet and ankle bones received strength!"

At this writing (Sept. 8th), I am gaining constantly. I am a new creature; am free from pain and soreness. In a week from my first leaving my bed, I rode by carriage six miles, and forty five by rail, to our camp meeting at the Weirs, and gained all the time I was gone. I have been to church two Sabbaths; and am continually telling, in compliance with his sacred command, while he is imparting this healing power to my body, "How great things the Lord hath done!" It is from a sense of duty that I thus communicate these facts to you; not from a desire to court public notice.

I want you all to join me in ascribing all honor and praise to Him who is Lord of all. I ask your prayers, that I may be kept by his power, "who is able to keep from falling," for it is only "by faith" I stand. Some cavil and say, "Why did he not work a perfect cure?" I do not hesitate to pronounce my case a miracle of mercy. He proposed to "restore and fit my body for his own temple." Then I'll not dictate my Lord, but while caring for his "temple," see that I possess the lowly and contrite heart, with which the high and lofty One, who inhabiteth eternity, deigns to dwell. Ellen C. Sherman.

Since the camp meeting, Sr. Eastman writes from Landaff, N. H., Sept. 18th, as follows:

"Bro. Grant:—I have seen Sr. Sherman to-day. She told me she fell in 1857, and put her knee partly out. The Dr. said the ligaments were displaced, and some might have been broken. It made it a stiff knee. She could not possibly put it up over the other knee, or bend it in. She had been unable to kneel for years; had to step carefully: but now it is as limber and as well as the other knee, and she can kneel and pray. She told me of other cures as wonderful as that. She said she wished she could see you and tell you all the Lord had done for her. She wanted me to tell you it was as great a miracle to have her nature so completely transformed, as it was for her body to be healed. She says she never knew before what it was to love the appearing of Jesus; and she looked up to the heavens as she told me this, and said, 'O, I should love to see him coming this moment!' She says she has very sweet communion with him; he abides with her constantly. She rode from Piermont here this week (twenty-two miles) in a carriage. Pray for her. We can not tell you one half. I wish we could see you."

Our Young Folks.

"My Son, Give Me Thy Heart."

"This have I done for thee!
What hast thou done for me?"
I saw thee walk so hopelessly
Where Satan led,
As nearer, nearer came thy feet
Down to the dead!
And oh! I pitied, yes, I pitied thee!
Lost soul, I pitied thee!
What hast thou done for me?

"This have I done for thee!
What hast thou done for me?"
I went to earth, and lo! all seemed
To hate me there,
Although I came in love to them,
Their grief to share.
I healed their sick, I raised their dead,
I gave them food;
And then some followed me awhile,
And called it good.
But when I tried to point their souls
To light and day,
Some quickly fled, some stood and mocked,
Some tried to slay.
Oh! I was grieved, was grieved for them and thee
Yes, soul, was grieved for thee!
What hast thou done for me?

"This have I done for thee!
What hast thou done for me?"
They shunned me, mocked me, disbelieved,
Despised my love,
All so unlike the homage of
My home above.—
Some struck me with their hands, while some Cried "Crucify!"
Then placing sharp thorns on my head,
Led me to die!
O soul! to die for thee, that thou might'st live.
Yes, soul, I died for thee!
What hast thou done for me?

"This have I done for thee!
What hast thou done for me?"
The cross was heavy which I bore,
But I shrank not;
The thorns were piercing that I wore,
I murmured not;
The hiding of my Father's face
Was worse than all.
But, thinking of thy dying soul,
I bore it all.
Yes, soul, I thought of thee and bore it all.
Lost soul, I thought of thee!
What hast thou done for me?

This do I now for thee!
What doest thou for me?
I stand before God's justice-throne
And plead for thee,
That still his arm will spare, and draw
Thy soul to me.
And when his anger burns because
Thou still wilt roam,
I cry, "Have mercy! It may be
He yet will come."
And thus, from year to year, I wait,
Pleading for thee,
Oh! wilt thou never, never do
One thing for me?

The frowns of the world would affect us less, if we were less covetous of its smiles.

Be Contented.

Some little folks, as well as some older ones, seem to be discontented with their work, or the place in which they live. Some are afraid the future has in store for them troubles, and with such thoughts in their minds they are restless and uneasy. They seem to be afraid to trust the Giver of all good for the blessings of to-morrow. They fear that they will become poor and have to beg, or be sent to the poor-house; or that death will call for them at no distant day.

In fact, I have often found myself turning in the way of discontent, and only by the help of my heavenly Father am I able to rest and say, "Not my will, O Lord, but thine be done."

I once read a fable that taught me a lesson of contentment, so I give it as I read it:

"Once or twice a little leaf was heard to cry and sigh, as the leaves often do when a gentle wind is about. And the twig said:

"What is the matter, little leaf?"

"The wind," said the leaf, "just told me that one day it would pull me off and throw me on the ground to die."

The twig told it to the branch and the branch told it to the tree.

And when the tree heard it, it rustled all over, and sent back word to the leaf:

"Do not be afraid; hold on tightly, and you shall not go off till you want to."

And so the leaf stoped sighing, and went on singing and rustling. And so it grew all summer long till October. And when the bright days of autumn came, the leaf saw all the leaves around becoming very beautiful. Some were yellow, and some were striped with colors. Then it asked the tree what it meant. And the tree said:

"All these leaves are getting ready to fly away, and they have put on these colors because of their joy."

Then the little leaf began to want to go, and grew very beautiful in thinking of it. And when it grew gay in colors, it saw that the branches of the tree had no colors in them, and so the leaf said, "Oh, branch, why are you lead colored, and we golden?"

"We must keep on our work clothes," said the tree, "for our work is not yet done; but your clothes are for a holiday because your task is over."

Just then a little puff of wind came, and the leaf let go without thinking of it, and the wind took it up and turned it over, and then let it fall gently down under the edge of a fence, among hundreds of leaves, and it never waked up to tell us what it dreamed about."

This is the fable, and it taught me a lesson of contentment. If we trust in God as we should, every day will bring just enough joys, duties and cares; and when we grow old and our heads become silvered, and we began to put on our holiday robes, like the little leaf of October, we will be ready to go and rest wherever God directs, and live again whenever he shall call us forth. —Cousin May.

A Boy's Commentary.

An old schoolmaster said one day to a clergyman who came to examine his school,—

"I believe the children know the catechism word for word."

"But do they understand it?—that is the question," said the clergyman.

The schoolmaster only bowed respectfully, and the examination began.

A little boy repeated the fifth commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother," and he was desired to explain it. Instead of trying to do so, the little boy, with his face covered with blushes, said almost in a whisper, "Yesterday I showed some strange gentlemen over the mountain. The sharp stones cut my feet, and they gave me some money to buy me some shoes. I gave it to my mother, for she had no shoes either, and I thought I could go barefoot better than she could."

Obituary.

DILWORTH.—Died, at East Columbus, Kansas, Oct. 6, 1873, Edgar Ambrose, son of B. F. and Sr. A. D. Dilworth. Aged, 3 years, 3 months and 19 days.

Words of comfort were spoken by the Rev. B. B. Scaggs, of the M. E. Church.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep;
A calm and undisturbed repose,
Unbroken by the last of foes."

BECK.—Died, Sept. 25, 1873, Miles Grant Beck, son of Mitchell and Susan Beck, of Henrietta, Wis. Aged, 13 months.

Words of comfort from John 11: 24, by
ANSON BROWN.

ALEXANDER.—Died, at Buchanan, Mich., Sept. 28, 1873, Julia, daughter of A. C. and J. A. Alexander. Aged, 13 years and 3 days.

Julia sleeps in Jesus. A short time before her death she gave her heart to her Saviour, and from that time, until she died, great peace of mind was hers to enjoy. No doubts troubled her. She was ready to pass through the gates of death, and rest until the coming of Christ. Then the victory will be gained, and our sister will return from the land of the enemy. Jesus has promised that "he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Blessed hope. May it console the hearts of the mourning ones, and stimulate them to be ready to meet their child, sister, and friend in the morning of the resurrection, when parting will be no more.
D. MATHEWSON.

BAXTER.—Died Sept. 21, 1873, at his residence, in Lexington, Mich., of typhoid fever, our beloved Brother William Baxter. Aged, 25 years, and eight months.

Br. Baxter experienced religion about four years ago, during a series of meetings held by the writer in the town of Elk. His evidence of acceptance in the beloved was clear, and his love for the truth we hold dear, was constant. It was my privilege to baptize him and his companion. Many sweet seasons of prayer have I enjoyed under their friendly roof. It was a Christian home indeed. Our friendship, connected by the strong tie of Christian love, was rich beyond what is common in all that constitutes and makes friendship precious. Br. Baxter exhibited a loving spirit in all his associations, and it is not too much to say he was beloved by all who knew him, and our most bitter opposers acknowledged he was a christian.

In the death of Br. William, the church in Lexington have lost a devoted brother, Sr. Baxter a kind and an affectionate husband, and little Willie, who made all weep who heard his plaintive, touching questions at the grave, "What are they going to do with my papa?" has lost a loving pa.

The writer addressed words of comfort to a large circle of relatives and friends in the Baptist church, from Rev. 14: 13, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."
GEO. W. WRIGHT.

DUNHAM.—Died, in Newburgh, Pike, Co., Ill., on the morning of Sept. 9, 1873, of congestion of the brain, after an illness of only 36 hours, Mrs. Ann C., wife of John Dunham, and daughter of Col. Stephen Pettis. Aged, 73 years and 6 months.

Our mother was born in Alburgh, Grand Isle Co., Vt., was married in 1816, and went with her husband the same year to their home in Luzerne, Warren Co., N. Y., where she was converted and united with the Congregational church. In 1838 she removed with her husband and family to this county, where she has lived ever since, honored and loved by all who knew her. Being a careful reader of the Scriptures she soon became convinced that she had not received the true baptism, and finding in the Adventist's the faith that best accorded with her own views of the Bible, she accordingly united with that church in 1853, an act which she never regretted.

At the early age of 14 years, the death of her mother left her to fill the responsible position of a mother towards five young children. Conscientiously was the duty performed, nobly was the trust fulfilled. Deprived so soon of a mother's counsels, and taking up the burdens of life at a tender age, many were the trials, the temptations, which beset her way, but she met them bravely, and with the calm dignity which characterized her whole life. Having young brothers and sisters looking to her for example, and trusting in her for guidance, she early learned the necessity of self-reliance. This was the refining process through which her nature was filtered, leaving it pure and true. Thus the school where she received her diploma which fortified her to meet the vicissitudes and changes of her after life, where she learned the blessed lesson of caring for the comforts and wishes of those who surrounded her, of always being ready to lend a helping hand to the desponding ones. All found in her a friend, sister, or mother, to whom they might go with their disappointments, and sorrows, as well as their joys—sure of her sympathy—knowing she was always happy when contributing to the enjoyment of others, ever ready to assist by her loving, christian counsel and encouragement.

As a neighbor, she was kind and obliging; as a friend, considerate and faithful; as a wife and mother, devoted, kind and loving; as a Christian, she strove for the long years since she made a profession, to walk in the narrow way trusting in the saviour for salvation.

She has gone to her rest, in the hope of the resurrection, crowned with blessings such as only a useful, cheerful, devoted life can impart.

Her portrait hangs upon the wall,
But in the window stands
The bowing myrtle that each day
She nursed with kindly hands;
Her sewing, as she left it, lies
In her housewifely store;
The needle that her busy hands
Shall ply, alas! no more.

Full, full of years, in ripe old age,
The last dread summons came;
All blessings on her holy life,
And on her honored name.
Ah! may her sorrowing children take
From her example strength
To fight life's battles to the end,
And win a crown at length.

Poetry.

The Narrow Way.

J. L. HERSEY.

I love the narrow way. It leads
To pastures green and fair;
To purling springs and flowing meads
And God himself is there.

It leads to happiness and joy,
Where pleasures ne'er decay;
And hurtful streams cannot destroy
The traveler on the way.

It leads where amaranthine flowers
Eternally will bloom;
Where gentle dews and kindly showers
And spicy breezes come.

It leads to all that's fair and light,
And beautiful and gay;
To groves of infinite delight
In an eternal day.

O, never will I turn my feet
A single hour aside,
Lest I should lose a moment's sight
Of Him who is my guide,

The Light of the City of God.

"And the Lamb is the light thereof."—(Rev. 21: 23.)

In the most literal and natural sense, as well as in every figurative sense, the Lamb is the light of the New Jerusalem. There are senses in which the Lamb is the light of this and of all worlds. Jesus says, "I am the light of this world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life"(John 8: 12). There is no doubt but the word is usually to be interpreted figuratively; so I repeat it, in every figurative, and in every possible sense, Jesus is the light of the city of our God.

No one will doubt that he is figuratively, but is he literally the light of the Holy City? We read in the context, "And the city has no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it." By the sun and the moon here, we are to understand the sun and moon naturally and literally. The plain import of the language is, that the city will have no need of these natural sources of light. Why no need? The reason assigned is, "For the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." His out-shining glory will be light enough. The city does not, and will not, need any other source of light. All suns, moons and stars might be blotted out of existence, but the light of the Holy City would not in the least be dimmed. I use the terms effulgence and effulgent because I can think of no better word. They mean shining out, diffusing a flood of light. There is, and there will be, a light and glory encircling the Lamb whose brightness does and will outshine the sun, and yet to immortal eyes it will not dazzle—it will not in the least be painful or unpleasant. Mere mortal eyes would be unable to endure it. Before the full radiance of Jehovah's glory they would faint away—not merely become as dead men, but be dead. God told Moses that no man could see his face and live(Exod. 33: 20). Paul says of him, that no one hath seen him, nor can see him (1 Tim. 6:16). The opinion seems to have been common among the Jews, that the glory of God was too great to be looked upon by mere mortal eyes.

The light is also as constant as it is effulgent and glorious. Hence we read, "And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign forever and ever" (Rev. 22: 5). There is such glory encircling the Lord God that it causes light surpassing the brightness of the sun, and so constant that there can be no night there. It is not a mere figure of speech which Isaiah uses when he says, "Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously" (Is. 24:23). The full radiance of his glory will eclipse and put to shame those great created lights. We learn that the earth was lightened by the unvailed glory of even an angel (Rev. 18: 1). When a little of the glory of the Lord was permitted to shine on the plains of Bethlehem, the shepherds were sore afraid (Luke 2: 9). When a little of that glory appeared on Mount Sinai, "the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel" (Exod. 24: 17).

We have said there will a glory encircle the Lamb which will outshine the sun, but have we any evidence that such is now the fact—that there is any such glory encircling the Holy One? The Psalmist says, "O Lord, my God, Thou art very great, Thou art clothed with honor and majesty. Who coverest Thyself with light as with a garment." (Ps. 104: 1, 2). Paul, speaking of our Lord Jesus Christ, the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords, says, "Who only hath immortality dwelling in light, which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen nor can see; to whom be glory and power everlasting. Amen" (Tim. 6: 16). It may be rendered, dwelling, or inhabiting unapproachable light. That is mere mortals cannot approach it.

Such passages inform us that our adorable Redeemer is encircled with light or glory, as with a garment; and such is its effulgence that mere mortals cannot look upon it or approach it. When Jesus appeared to John on patmos in a part of his glory, he fell at his foot as dead (Rev. 1: 17). Had John not been in the ecstatic state, expressed in the original by "epneumati," and had the full glory of Jehovah Jesus been displayed, doubtless he would have fallen dead. So Ezekiel, though in the ecstactic state, at the appearance of some of the glory of God, fell on his face (Ezek. 1: 2; 3; 23). So also we have mention of others falling prostrat.

When our Saviour was transfigured, there was seen a little of the glory with which he is now arrayed, and it is said, "His face did shine as the sun; and his garment was as white as the light" (Matt. 17: 2; Mark. 6: 3). According to 2 Pet. 1: 16, it is evident that in the transfiguration the apostles had a representation of what the power and coming of the Lord Jesus will be. They then saw something of the glory with which he will be arrayed, when he will come in his glory. If, while in his mortal state on the mount—if while in his state of humiliation, he was so clothed with glory that his face shone as the sun, and his raiment was as white as the light, how must that face be clothed with glory now, and how will it shine in the New Jerusalem, in in the company of the glorified? May we not suppose that there it will exeed the sun—that then all created lights will grow pale before his effulgent glory? When John saw Jesus on Patmos, "His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength" (Rev. 1: 16). It was not as the shining of the rising or setting sun, but as the cloudless, noonday sun. So when it is said of the King eternal, that no one hath seen him, it is evident that he is too glorious for mere mortal sight. Man cannot look at the unclouded noonday sun—how much less on him whose outshining glory exceeds the sun shining in his strength. From these and other passages it seems evident that the New Jerusalem, with Jesus in it, will not need the light of sun, moon or stars. His glory will outshine the sun, and it will be so constant that "there shall be no night there." It does not say there will be no sun nor moon. According to various passages, I believe both will then exist—both will then shine with much more than their present splendor, but their light will not be needed in the New Jerusalem. Artificial lights are not needed in the cloudless noon, so those bright, created lights will not be needed, and like a candle at noon, will grow pale. The candle gives as much light at noon as at midnight, but its light dwindles into insignificance, and is lost amid the full glory of the sun, so it will be with the sun itself before the full glory of the Lord. I believe the sun will shine, and will be needed in the new earth, but not in the New Jerusalem. And whether the sun or the moon shine in the city or not, there will be no night there. Such is the effulgent glory of the Lamb, and there can be no night, and there can be no darkness there. The Divinity, the Godhead is expressed by God, and the Lord God; and by the Lamb is, doubtless, expressed the humanity of Jesus. It seems that the very humanity of Jesus is encircled by a glory outshining the sun. When transfigured on the mount, his face shone as the sun, but now in his full glory it outshines the sun. Oh, what a glorification of humanity! As is the head, such will his followers be! Angels are so crowned with glory, that when one of them appeared in some of his glory, the earth was lightened by it; but encircling none of them is there such glory as is to be seen in our glorified Jesus—our Emanuel. Thus in glorified humanity there will be an excelling of glory. Oh, how is our nature glorified and exalted in and by Jesus! But will humanity be thus exalted—thus glorified in the redeemed? Yes, thus, but I do not say equally. May humanity in us be so glorified that it will even exceed the glory of the angles? Yea doubtless. May our glory so shine out as to afford a light like the Son of God? Undoubtedly. If we are admitted into the royal family of the heavens, we are to be made like the Son of God in all things. The distinguishing difference between us and God—and, doubtless, it is the only distinguishing difference—will be that in every sense we will lack infinity. But the body of our humiliation is to be fashioned like to the body of his glory. Phil. 3: 21, original. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of our Father. Who hath ears to hear let him hear" (Matt. 13: 43.) Examine the original as closely as we may, and we find it is just as Jesus says: they "shall shine forth, or shine out, as the sun." They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. 12: 3.) Our blessed Saviour said in his prayer, "The glory which thou gavest me, I have given them" (John 17: 22.) If so, in the kingdom of our Father that glory will shine out as the sun. John says, "It doth not appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like him" (1 John, 3: 2.) Paul tells us that, "As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall bear the image of the heavenly" (1 Cor. 15: 49,) that is, as we have borne the image of the earthy or first Adam, so we shall bear the image of the heavenly or second Adam. And when we shall fully appear in that image, "we should be like him." We shall be glorious as he is glorious. The New Jerusalem will be full of phosphers—light-bearers.

There is a great deal of evidence that man in his original innocence was clothed with light as with a garment. Though destitute of raiment, he was not really naked, but was clothed with light. When he fell, that vesture of light was lost, and lo, he was really naked. He was even more naked than the beasts by which he was surrounded. A late learned, talented and pious author speaking of man being made in the likeness of God, says, "God clothes hinself with light, and as man was made after his likeness, we reasonably conclude that he clothed our first parents in the garb of light. Without this dress they would have been imperfect in appearance, and unlike him. When they sinned against God, this feature of their likeness to their Creator was removed. When they perceived that, and saw clearly that they were naked, they were afraid and ashamed, and sought to hide themselves from God among the trees of the garden; and also sought to cover their shame from themselves by making girdles of fig leaves." If man in his original state was clothed with light, then in his glorified state he will be thus clothed, for it will be a restored state. Christ will restore what we have lost, in Adam, "Encircled with light, and with glory enshrouded."

As Christ in his transfiguration showed his apostles something of what he now is in glory, and what he will be when he comes again, so there have been very holy persons, who at times, when they have had very great nearness to God, have had a little of the outshining of the lost glory and light. Of Moses, who had long communed with God on the mount, we are told, "And it came to pass, when Moses came down from Mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses' hand, when he came down from the mount, that Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone while he talked with Him. And when Aaron and all the children af Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him. And the children of Israel saw the face of Moses, that the skin of Moses' face shone: and Moses put a vail upon his face again, until he went in to speak with Him" (Exod. 34: 29, 30, 35). We also learn that the face of Moses shone so brightly that the children of Israel could not look upon him (2 Cor. 3: 7). Perhaps it may have been something like trying to look upon the sun at noon. It was said the face of Stephen was as if the face of an angel (Acts 6: 15). Even in our own times there have been many instances in which the lost glory, or something like it, has been seen. They have usually been transient flashes, outshining of the lost light; flashes of that which by and by shall be permanent and eternal. Reader, along with our glorified Redeemer, shall that glory be your glory? If in heart and life you are like him, you will have eternal glory like his; but you must have heart-likeness to Christ here, in ordes to have his glorified and eternal likeness hereafter. If you have the one, you will have the other, but cannot have the one without the other. If you have heart holiness, then the glory of Christ, or such as his, will be revealed in you; but if you are a rejecter of Christ, you connet appear with him in glory. Where then will you appear, and how?

If you do not appear with Christ, you will with Satan. You will appear like him, and, like him, be divested of all glory. Like him you will be dark bodies—the blackness of darkness itself. If you bear the image of Satan here—if you have his heart-likeness, you must in every sense be like him there. He has lost all the light and glory which he once had, and to him it is lost forever. Oh, take heed how you treat Jesus, lest your glory may soon be lost forever.

Contrast that holy city which is full of glory, so full that it is all lighted with glory, with that world which is the blackness of darkness; and do you not pay too dear for any form of sin, if, in gaining it, you lose that blest city, and go where darkness reigns?—Prophetic Times.

Empty Profession.

More is properly expected of some professed Christians than of others, because they profess more. They profess to have been "renewed in the spirit and temper of their minds," to trust in Christ as their alone Savior, imitate him as their model, eschew the pomps and vanities of the world, and manifest by their daily walk the power and nature of true religion. On this account it is reasonably expected that they will surpass others in spirituality of mind, integrity and philanthropy. If a person who supposes himself to be converted from sin to holiness, and from the world to Christ, does not intend to feel and act differently from those who "have their portion in this life,"—the impenitent and unbelieving—he should not claim to be a Christian. Alexander the Great had a soldier in his army who bore his own name, but was a great coward. The emperor, enraged at his conduct, justly said—"Either change your name, or learn to honor it." So if one who professes to be a Christian disgrace the sacred name he bears, he had better not bear it. Let him rather bear the name of the strangers to Christ with whom he sympathizes in thought, speech and behavior, and with whom for time and eternity he casts in his lot.—Religious Herald.

Sanctification unto Holiness.

P. W. MATTS.

That sanctification is a command from God, and is essential to salvation, no one can deny, and believe the word of God; and that there are many different opinions as to what it is, and when a person comes under its influence, is another evident fact, some blending holiness with sanctifying, whilst others claim conversion as that of sanctification, when in fact they are all three separate and distinct in the christian character, the one taking place when the other has done its work.

I do not enter into this subject with a desire for controversy, but believing the doctrine of Sanctification unto Holiness to be an imperative command from God, I do it with feelings of love toward God and his beloved Son, that I may gain a knowledge of his will and be the better prepared understandingly to abide by his wishes. God has not willed anything by and through his revelations to man, and yet have it veiled in mystery; nor need we remain very long in doubt, if we, the recipients of his love, are willing to walk in the light.

If it is true, then, that we can only gain information from God and his beloved Son, from his revealed law (word,) upon subjects of such vital importance to our future and eternal welfare, as that of Sanctification unto Holiness, we do well then to go to the fountain of all truth, in the spirit of love, in the meekness of our great Teacher, to implore his mercy, in bestowing upon our minds an impress of that great guide, the word of God. Jesus prays, (John 17: 17) "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth." This verse proves to me that it is God's word, and the fulfilling and obeying of that word, that will sanctify even the vilest sinner in the world. His word is truth; hence I understand also that it is necessary that the sanctifying influence or material must be mixed with truth in order to have the desired effect. Jesus also, in praying the Father to sanctify his chosen ones, says, "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world"—an excellent recommend for all those that love the soon appearing of our King. Praise to our King forever.
